

1-1-2017

Denying Certiorari in Bell v. Itawamba County School Board: A Missed Opportunity to Clarify Students' First Amendment Rights in the Digital Age

Elizabeth A. Shaver

Follow this and additional works at: <https://brooklynworks.brooklaw.edu/blr>

 Part of the Constitutional Law Commons, Education Law Commons, First Amendment Commons, Internet Law Commons, and the Supreme Court of the United States Commons

Recommended Citation

Elizabeth A. Shaver, Denying Certiorari in Bell v. Itawamba County School Board: A Missed Opportunity to Clarify Students' First Amendment Rights in the Digital Age, 82 Brook. L. Rev. (2017).

Available at: <https://brooklynworks.brooklaw.edu/blr/vol82/iss4/3>

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Law Journals at BrooklynWorks. It has been accepted for inclusion in Brooklyn Law Review by an authorized editor of BrooklynWorks.

Denying Certiorari in Bell v. Itawamba County School Board

A MISSED OPPORTUNITY TO CLARIFY STUDENTS' FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHTS IN THE DIGITAL AGE

Elizabeth A. Shaver[†]

INTRODUCTION

In the last decade, the federal appellate courts have grappled with the issue whether, and to what extent, school officials constitutionally may discipline students for their off-campus speech. Before 2015, three federal circuit courts had extended school authority to off-campus electronic speech by applying a vague test that allows school officials to reach far beyond the iconic “schoolhouse gate” referenced in the Supreme Court’s 1969 landmark decision—Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District.¹ Two other federal circuits had avoided the issue altogether by deciding the cases before them on other grounds.²

In 2015, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals became the sixth circuit court to wrestle with the issue. In August 2015, the Fifth Circuit issued an en banc ruling in which multiple judges urged the Supreme Court to provide guidance regarding the scope of school discipline over students’ off-campus speech.³ When a petition for a writ of certiorari was filed in the Fifth [†] Associate Professor of Legal Writing, The University of Akron School of Law. As always, many thanks to Phil Carino for his assistance.

¹ Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969); see S.J.W. ex rel. Wilson v. Lee’s Summit R-7 Sch. Dist., 696 F.3d 771, 776–77 (8th Cir. 2012); Kowalski v. Berkeley Cty. Sch., 652 F.3d 565, 574–75 (4th Cir. 2011); Doninger v. Niehoff, 527 F.3d 41, 48 (2d Cir. 2008).

² Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1070–72 (9th Cir. 2013); Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 205, 219 (3d Cir. 2011) (en banc); J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915, 925 (3d Cir. 2011).

³ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 433 (5th Cir. 2015) (Prado, J., dissenting) (“I hope that the Supreme Court soon will give courts the necessary guidance to resolve these difficult cases.”); id. at 403 (Costa, J., concurring) (“[T]his court or the higher one will need to provide clear guidance for students, teachers, and school administrators . . .”).

Circuit case,⁴ it seemed possible that the Supreme Court indeed would provide the guidance desperately needed by the lower courts. However, on February 29, 2016, just days after the unexpected death of Justice Antonin Scalia,⁵ the Supreme Court denied the petition that had been filed in the Fifth Circuit case.⁶ The eight-member Court thus missed an opportunity to address this important First Amendment issue.

Determining the proper scope of school authority over student speech in the digital age involves a complex set of considerations. When not at school, students have all the constitutional rights of other citizens, including free speech rights. In addition, there must be a proper boundary—an “outer boundar[y]”⁷—on the ability of school officials to reach outside of the school community and regulate students’ behavior when they are not at school. Indeed, special care should be taken to protect students’ rights to engage in free speech so that the exercise of their free speech rights is not unduly hampered by the very institution—school—that is charged with the responsibility of teaching students important democratic principles.

On the other hand, the capabilities of digital speech are such that student electronic speech, even if created and distributed entirely outside of school, can have a profound impact on the school community. In many instances, school officials, by acting on information obtained from students’ electronic speech, are able to avoid harm to the school community—most notably in cases involving threats of violence such as school shootings.⁸ Thus, school officials must be given the appropriate tools to impose discipline when necessary to preserve and protect the primary goal of schools: to provide a ⁴ See Petition for a Writ of Certiorari, Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., No. 15-666, 2015 WL 7299351, at *15 (Nov. 17, 2015).

⁵ Justice Scalia died unexpectedly on February 13, 2016. See Adam Liptak, Antonin Scalia, Justice on the Supreme Court, Dies at 79, N.Y. TIMES (Feb. 13, 2016), http://www.nytimes.com/2016/02/14/us/antonin-scalia-death.html?_r=0 [https://perma.cc/V8GH-AKXY].

⁶ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 136 S. Ct. 1166 (2016) (mem.). While it is impossible to know why the Supreme Court denies certiorari in any particular case, there is evidence that the pace of accepted cases slowed after Justice Scalia’s death. See Robert Barnes, Scalia’s Death Affecting Next Term, Too? Pace of Accepted Cases at Supreme Court Slows., WASH. POST (May 1, 2016), https://www.washingtonpost.com/politics/courts_law/scalias-death-affecting-next-term-too-pace-of-accepted-cases-at-supreme-court-slows/2016/05/01/1d304d1c-0ecb-11e6-bfa1-4efa856caf2a_story.html?utm_term=.2b46db42e521 [https://perma.cc/N3G4-BC7N]. It may be that the Court is reluctant to address certain constitutional issues when it is not at full strength.

⁷ Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 401 (2007); Porter v. Ascension Parish Sch. Bd., 393 F.3d 608, 615 n.22 (5th Cir. 2004).

⁸ Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1065 (9th Cir. 2013).

high-quality learning environment in which students can access and master the academic curriculum.

This article reviews the varied approaches the federal circuits have taken regarding the scope of school officials' authority to discipline students for electronic speech that is created and distributed outside of school. The article then proposes an analytical framework that, building on Supreme Court precedent, protects students' free speech rights while preserving the ability of school officials to ensure the safety and wellbeing of the school community.

Part I of this article examines the Supreme Court's student speech precedents, none of which involved student off-campus electronic speech. Part II of the article then reviews the decisions in which the circuit courts have sought to apply the Supreme Court's precedents to determine the scope of school authority over students' off-campus electronic speech.

Part III examines the views of legal scholars on these issues and proposes a framework designed to both protect students' First Amendment rights and preserve the ability of school officials to ensure the safety and wellbeing of all individuals in the school community. As described in more detail below, the framework proposes that the Court (a) specifically address the lack of First Amendment protection for any student speech that threatens violence to members of the school community; (b) ensure that student electronic speech that bullies or harasses another student receives no First Amendment protection; (c) apply Tinker's substantial disruption standard to student off-campus electronic speech that causes an actual disruption at school; and (d) decline to apply Tinker's "reasonable forecast of a future substantial disruption" standard to off-campus student electronic speech.

The overall goal of this framework is to delineate when students' electronic off-campus speech extends beyond the scope of school authority. Imposing a geographic boundary—i.e., limiting school authority to student speech that occurs only at school—is unworkable given the reach of digital speech. Thus, any comprehensive framework on this topic must specifically address forms and types of students' electronic speech in separate categories.

I. THE SUPREME COURT'S STUDENT SPEECH CASES

A. The Supreme Court First Addresses the Scope of Students' First Amendment Speech Rights

The Supreme Court has decided four student speech cases.⁹ Although none of the Supreme Court's student speech cases involved electronic off-campus speech, the decisions nonetheless provide an analytical framework that can be applied to student speech in the digital age.¹⁰

Over forty-five years ago, the Supreme Court first addressed the issue of students' First Amendment rights while at school. In Tinker v. Des Moines Independent Community School District, several students sued their local school district after the school suspended them for wearing black armbands as a protest against the Vietnam War.¹¹ The Court found that the disciplinary measures violated the students' First Amendment rights.¹²

In so holding, the Court affirmed that students do not "shed their constitutional rights to freedom of speech or expression at the schoolhouse gate."¹³ Yet the Court also recognized that First Amendment rights were to be applied "in light of the special characteristics of the school environment."¹⁴ In the Court's view, the school setting involves countervailing considerations that must be balanced. On the one hand, as institutions that "educat[e] the young for citizenship,"¹⁵ schools should not act in a manner that would "strangle the free mind"¹⁶ or otherwise "teach youth to discount important principles of our government"¹⁷ such as the right to freedom of ⁹ Morse, 551 U.S. 393; Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988); Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986); Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503 (1969).

¹⁰ See infra Part III.

¹¹ Tinker, 393 U.S. at 504. The plan to wear black armbands as a protest of the Vietnam War arose out of a meeting of adults and students held at the home of one of the plaintiffs in the case. Id. This plan was communicated to the principals of the Des Moines school, who adopted a policy prohibiting the wearing of black armbands at school and authorizing the suspension of any student who refused to remove a black armband. Id. The plaintiffs in the case were aware of the newly instituted policy before the day that they wore black armbands to school. Id. In accordance with the school policy, they were suspended until they returned to school without black armbands. Id.

¹² Id. at 505–06, 514. The Court found that the act of wearing black armbands constituted symbolic speech that was entitled to First Amendment protection. Id. at 505–06.

¹³ Id. at 506.

¹⁴ Id.

¹⁵ Id. at 507 (quoting West Virginia v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 637 (1943)).

¹⁶ Id. (quoting Barnette, 319 U.S. at 637).

¹⁷ Id. (quoting Barnette, 319 U.S. at 637).

expression. On the other hand, the Court recognized the “comprehensive authority”¹⁸ of school officials to maintain order at school. According to the Court, school officials must have the ability to “prescribe and control conduct in the schools.”¹⁹

To balance these competing concerns, the Court held that school officials constitutionally may discipline students for speech that “materially and substantially disrupt[s] the work and discipline of the school.”²⁰ The Court also explained that school officials need not wait for an actual disruption to occur at school before imposing discipline on a student, so long as school officials reasonably could forecast a future substantial disruption.²¹ The Court cautioned that any such forecast could not be based on either “undifferentiated fear or apprehension”²² or a “desire to avoid this discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompanies an unpopular viewpoint.”²³

On the facts before it, the Court found that school officials had acted not to avoid a substantial disruption at school, but simply to avoid discussing the merits of the Vietnam War. The Court noted that the school policy had “singled out for prohibition”²⁴ the wearing of black armbands to protest the Vietnam War, not any other symbols that might be politically controversial.²⁵ A ban on the expression of one particular position was not constitutionally permissible in the absence of any evidence that the ban was necessary to avoid substantial interference within the school setting.²⁶

Although it articulated a “substantial interference” or “substantial disruption” standard by which to examine the constitutionality of school discipline, the decision in Tinker was not necessarily the model of clarity. First, the Court did not clearly define what constitutes the “work” or “discipline” of school. In addition, the Court did not clearly articulate the facts or factors that cause a disruption of the school environment to be “substantial” or “material.”²⁷ The Court also indicated that discipline might be appropriate if a student’s

¹⁸ Id.

¹⁹ Id.

²⁰ Id. at 513.

²¹ Id. at 514.

²² Id. at 508.

²³ Id. at 509.

²⁴ Id. at 510–11.

²⁵ Id. at 510.

²⁶ Id. at 510–11.

²⁷ The Court used different terminology in different sections of the opinion, referring to both “substantial disorder” and a “material disrupt[ion of] classwork” as constitutionally permissible grounds for discipline. Id. at 513.

speech “intrude[d],”²⁸ “impinge[d],”²⁹ “inva[ded],”³⁰ or “collid[ed] with”³¹ the rights of other students, although the Court did not illustrate when such circumstances might occur.

In reviewing the specific facts, the Court noted that the students’ act of wearing armbands had not been accompanied “by any disorder or disturbance on the part of” the plaintiffs.³² The Court also noted that there had been no evidence presented that any class was disrupted by the wearing of the armbands.³³ The Court further stated: “[o]utside the classrooms, a few students made hostile remarks to the children wearing armbands, but there were no threats or acts of violence on school premises.”³⁴

Justice Hugo Black dissented from the decision in Tinker.³⁵ He principally took issue with the majority’s conclusion that the students’ symbolic speech had not interfered with schoolwork. While acknowledging that the wearing of black armbands had not prompted “obscene remarks or boisterous and loud disorder,” Justice Black argued that school officials were justified in disciplining the students because their speech had “diverted” other students’ attention from their classwork.³⁶ He opined that students could be disciplined for any speech that would cause other students to take their minds off of their schoolwork.³⁷ In Justice Black’s view, even a minor or momentary diversion from assigned classwork could be disciplined.

In addition to being somewhat vague about the contours of a substantial disruption, the decision in Tinker also failed to clearly define the proper scope or definition of the “school environment,”³⁸ a highly relevant question when considering student speech in the digital age. While the Court did use the clear image of a physical location—the space located within the ²⁸ Id. at 508.

²⁹ Id. at 509.

³⁰ Id. at 513.

³¹ Id.

³² Id. at 508.

³³ Id. The majority stated that no class had been disrupted in spite of evidence apparently in the record that a mathematics class had been “wrecked” by an in-class dispute with one of the students wearing a black armband. Id. at 517 (Black, J., dissenting).

³⁴ Id. at 508 (majority opinion).

³⁵ Id. at 515 (Black, J., dissenting).

³⁶ Id. at 518.

³⁷ Id. (“And I repeat that if the time has come when pupils of state-supported schools, kindergartens, grammar schools, or high schools, can defy and flout orders of school officials to keep their minds on their own schoolwork, it is the beginning of a new revolutionary era of permissiveness in this country fostered by the judiciary.”).

³⁸ Id. at 506 (majority opinion).

“schoolhouse gate”³⁹—it also broadened the scope of the ruling beyond the four corners of a classroom. The Court stated that its ruling was not limited to “supervised and ordained discussion which takes places in the classroom,”⁴⁰ but that students retained their First Amendment rights, consistent standards articulated, to express an opinion whether “in the cafeteria, or on the playing field, or on the campus during the authorized hours.”⁴¹ Yet, in another sentence, the Court stated that school officials have authority to regulate student speech, whether it takes place “in class or out of it,” if the speech creates a substantial interference or disruption.⁴²

Of course, the Court cannot be faulted for not anticipating the digital age when it decided Tinker. Yet, when the lower federal courts seek to determine the scope of school authority over student electronic speech that is created and distributed outside of school, some courts have resorted to reading the “tea leaves” of these particular statements in Tinker in an attempt to define what it means to be at school.⁴³

Although the Court in Tinker used both the words “interference” and “disruption” to describe the effect of student speech on the school environment, the standard articulated in Tinker has become known as the “substantial disruption” standard. Since Tinker, the Court has never explicitly defined the phrase “substantial disruption.”⁴⁴

B. The Court Determines That Students May Be Disciplined for Lewd or Obscene Speech That Is Uttered at School

More than fifteen years after Tinker, the Court again addressed the issue of students’ First Amendment rights. In Bethel School District No. 403 v. Fraser, a young man filed suit alleging that school officials had violated his First Amendment rights by disciplining him for giving a speech at a school assembly that had been replete with sexual metaphor.⁴⁵ The school determined that the student’s conduct violated the ³⁹ Id.

⁴⁰ Id. at 512.

⁴¹ Id. at 512–13.

⁴² Id. at 513.

⁴³ See J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915, 937 (3d Cir. 2011) (Smith, J., concurring) (describing cases in which the courts were divided regarding the application of Tinker to off-campus expression).

⁴⁴ See Lisa Smith-Butler, Walking the Regulatory Tightrope: Balancing Bullies’ Free Speech Rights Against the Rights of Victims to Be Left Alone When Regulating Off-Campus K–12 Student Cyberspeech, 37 NOVA L. REV. 243, 303 (2013).

⁴⁵ Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986).

school's code of conduct, which used the language of Tinker in prohibiting any conduct that "materially and substantially interfere[d] with the educational process . . . including the use of obscene, profane language or gestures."⁴⁶ The student prevailed both at the trial court and appellate level; both courts found that the school's code of conduct was unconstitutionally vague and that the student's speech had not caused a substantial disruption at school as required by Tinker.⁴⁷ The Supreme Court reversed, finding that discipline was appropriate because the student had engaged in lewd and obscene speech at school.⁴⁸

The Court first distinguished the sexually charged speech in Fraser from the black armbands of Tinker, stating that the students in Tinker had not "intrude[d] upon the work of the school[] or the rights of other students."⁴⁹ The Court then expanded upon Tinker's concept of the "work" of public schools, opining a "highly appropriate function of public school education [is] to prohibit the use of vulgar and offensive terms in public discourse."⁵⁰ Noting that students' First Amendment rights are not "coextensive with the rights of adults in other settings," the Court found that students do not have the same freedom in terms of their choice of words when expressing their opinions.⁵¹ While an adult in a public place has the right to choose lewd or obscene language to express a particular viewpoint, students are not permitted the "same latitude" when at school.⁵² Rather, a student's "freedom to advocate unpopular and controversial views in schools and classrooms" is tempered by "society's countervailing interest in teaching students the boundaries of socially appropriate behavior."⁵³ Thus, the Court held that the First Amendment allows school officials to discipline students for lewd or obscene speech that "undermine[s] the school's basic educational mission."⁵⁴

⁴⁶ Id. at 678.

⁴⁷ Fraser v. Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403, 755 F.2d 1356, 1365 (9th Cir. 1985).

⁴⁸ Fraser, 478 U.S. at 676.

⁴⁹ Id. at 680.

⁵⁰ Id. at 683.

⁵¹ Id. at 682.

⁵² Id. Referring to its own 1971 decision in Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971), in which the Court struck down on First Amendment grounds the criminal conviction of an individual who wore a jacket bearing the words, "Fuck the Draft" in public, the Court noted that "the First Amendment gives a high school student the classroom right to wear Tinker's armband, but not Cohen's jacket." Fraser, 478 U.S. at 682-83 (quoting Thomas v. Bd. of Educ., Granville Cent. Sch. Dist., 607 F.2d 1043, 1057 (2d Cir. 1979) (Newman, J., concurring)).

⁵³ Id. at 682-83.

⁵⁴ Id. at 685.

In concurring with the decision in Fraser, Justice Brennan made the significant point that the Court's decision was limited to lewd speech uttered at school. He stated that "had [the student] given the same speech outside of the school environment, he could not have been penalized simply because government officials considered his language to be inappropriate."⁵⁵ In so stating, Justice Brennan affirmed the view of many lower courts that students can freely use lewd or obscene speech when not at school.⁵⁶

In addition, Justice Brennan repeatedly invoked the substantial disruption standard of Tinker, characterizing both the language itself and its effect on the school environment as "disruptive."⁵⁷ Specifically, Justice Brennan stated that the school officials had sought to "ensure that [the] . . . assembly proceed[ed] in an orderly manner,"⁵⁸ and that the discipline had been imposed because the student's speech "disrupted the school's educational mission."⁵⁹ In his concurrence, Justice Brennan construed the majority holding as an application of Tinker's substantial disruption standard.⁶⁰

Thus, the Court in Fraser was divided on the central question—whether Tinker's substantial disruption standard was the only framework under which regulation of student speech would be constitutional. This division would again be evident in the third student speech case decided by the Court.

C. The Supreme Court Finds That Schools May Exercise Editorial Control over Student Speech That Appears in School-Sponsored Publications

Just two years after the Fraser decision, the Court again issued a significant decision in the arena of students' First Amendment rights. In Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier, the Court held that school officials could "exercise editorial control"⁶¹ over the contents of a school newspaper prepared by ⁵⁵ Id. at 688 (citing Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)).

⁵⁶ See, e.g., Klein v. Smith, 635 F. Supp. 1440, 1441–42 (D. Me. 1986) (holding that the school could not discipline a student for "giving the finger" to a teacher he encountered in a restaurant parking lot, stating: "The First Amendment protection of freedom of expression may not be made a casualty of the effort to force-feed good manners to the ruffians among us").

⁵⁷ See Fraser, 478 U.S. at 683.

⁵⁸ Id. at 689 (Brennan, J., concurring).

⁵⁹ Id. at 688–89.

⁶⁰ Indeed, Justice Marshall dissented from the decision in Fraser on the ground that the school had not shown a "disruption of the educational process." Id. at 690 (Marshall, J., dissenting).

⁶¹ Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 262 (1988).

high school students as part of a journalism course. The students filed suit after the school principal deleted two stories from the newspaper.⁶² The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the school newspaper constituted a public forum and that school officials could not censor the contents of the paper in the absence of a substantial disruption under Tinker.⁶³ The Supreme Court reversed. First, the Court found that the school newspaper was not a public forum, but was a vehicle for students to learn and apply skills gained in a journalism course that was part of the school's curriculum.⁶⁴ The Court held that the pedagogical goal of producing the school newspaper distinguished it from a public forum such that school officials had not "relinquish[ed] school control over that activity."⁶⁵

The Court's determination that the school newspaper was not a public forum was significant because, in the Court's view, the remaining issue was only whether school officials had exercised their rights "to regulate the content[] of [the newspaper] in [a] reasonable manner."⁶⁶ The question of the reasonableness, the Court stated, was the standard by which the case was to be decided, not the substantial disruption standard established in Tinker.⁶⁷ The Court characterized Tinker as a case involving "[t]he question whether the First Amendment requires a school to tolerate particular student speech."⁶⁸ The Court then contrasted Kuhlmeier as a case involving "the question whether the First Amendment requires a school affirmatively to promote particular student speech."⁶⁹ Finding that Tinker was factually distinguishable, the Court then explicitly created a separate constitutionally permissible category of regulation over student speech. It described this category as control over "school-sponsored publications, theatrical productions, and other expressive activities that students, parents, and members of the public might reasonably ⁶² Id. at 263–64. The two stories involved topics of teen pregnancy and divorce. Id. at 263.

⁶³ Kuhlmeier v. Hazelwood Sch. Dist., 795 F.2d 1368, 1374 (8th Cir. 1986), rev'd, 484 U.S. 260 (1988).

⁶⁴ Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. at 269–70.

⁶⁵ Id. at 270.

⁶⁶ Id.

⁶⁷ Id. The Court in Kuhlmeier also characterized Tinker as delineating the ability of school officials "to silence a student's personal expression that happens to occur on school premises." Id. at 271.

⁶⁸ Id. at 270.

⁶⁹ Id. at 270–71. The Court made clear that the Tinker standard did not apply, stating its conclusion "that the standard articulated in Tinker for determining when a school may punish student expression need not also be the standard for determining when a school may refuse to lend its name and resources to the dissemination of student expression." Id. at 272–73.

perceive to bear the imprimatur of the school.”⁷⁰ In this “second form of student expression,”⁷¹ the Court granted school officials great discretion, finding that school officials do not violate the First Amendment “so long as their actions are reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns.”⁷²

As he had done in Fraser, Justice Brennan again wrote a separate opinion, although in Kuhlmeier he dissented from the decision.⁷³ Joined by Justices Marshall and Blackmun, Justice Brennan sharply criticized the majority’s decision to “abandon[] Tinker”⁷⁴ in favor of the creation of a second category of permissible regulation over student speech. He argued that the majority’s decision to divide student speech into “incidental” and “school-sponsored” expression had no basis in precedent.⁷⁵

In so arguing, Justice Brennan discussed Fraser at length, asserting that, just two years earlier in Fraser, the Court had “faithfully applied Tinker.”⁷⁶ Justice Brennan argued that Tinker granted school officials sufficient authority to regulate student expression that would interfere with a school’s pedagogical or curricular goals.⁷⁷

In doing so, Justice Brennan employed an expansive definition of the phrase substantial disruption, stating that school officials could censor student expression appearing in a school newspaper if the content contained “poor grammar, writing or research because to reward such expression would ‘materially disrupt[t]’ the newspaper’s curricular purpose.”⁷⁸ He distinguished such constitutionally permissible conduct from censorship designed to shield either the newspaper’s readers or the school from the effect of the expression. Justice Brennan concluded that, on the facts before the Court, it was clear that ⁷⁰ Id. at 271, 273.

⁷¹ Id. at 271.

⁷² Id. at 273.

⁷³ Id. at 277–91 (Brennan, J., dissenting); Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 687–690 (1986) (Brennan, J., concurring).

⁷⁴ Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. at 282.

⁷⁵ Id. at 282–83 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

⁷⁶ Id. at 281–82. The majority in Kuhlmeier addressed that contention in a footnote, disagreeing with Justice Brennan that the decision in Fraser had been grounded in Tinker’s substantial disruption standard. Id. at 271, n.4 (majority opinion) (“The decision in Fraser rested on the ‘vulgar,’ ‘lewd,’ and ‘plainly offensive’ character of a speech delivered at an official school assembly rather than on any propensity of the speech to ‘materially disrupt[t] classwork or involv[e] substantial disorder or invasion of the rights of others.’” (alterations in original) (quoting Fraser, 393 U.S. at 513)).

⁷⁷ Id. at 283–84 (Brennan, J., dissenting). The majority interpreted Tinker’s reference to speech that invaded the rights of other students as referring to speech of one student regarding another student that could give rise to tort liability on the part of the school. Id. at 273, n.5 (majority opinion).

⁷⁸ Id. at 284 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

school officials had acted to shield the audience from material that they deemed to be “too sensitive” or “unsuitable” for an audience of student-readers. That form of censorship, he determined, was unconstitutional.

The decision in Kuhlmeier revealed the continued divide among the justices regarding the appropriate constitutional framework under which to analyze student speech cases. That divide would exist for nearly twenty years, until the Court again decided a student speech case.

D. The Court Allows School Officials to Discipline Students for On-Campus Speech That Promotes Illegal Drug Use

Nearly twenty years after the decision in Kuhlmeier, the Court decided its fourth student speech case. In a 2007 decision, Morse v. Frederick, the Court ruled that school officials may constitutionally regulate student speech that reasonably is perceived as promoting illegal drug use.⁷⁹ In Morse, school officials had allowed students to leave school grounds during school hours, although supervised by school employees, in order to watch the 2002 Olympic Torch Relay pass by on the street. While standing on the sidewalk, a group of students unfurled a homemade banner displaying the message “BONG HiTS 4 JESUS.”⁸⁰ When the school principal saw the banner, she directed the students to take it down, and all except one student complied.⁸¹ The principal confiscated the banner and suspended the student for displaying a banner with a pro-drug use message, in violation of a school policy prohibiting advocacy of illegal drug use.⁸² He then brought suit, alleging a violation of his First Amendment rights.⁸³

The lower courts were divided; the federal district court granted summary judgment in favor of the school on the ground that the principal had reasonably interpreted the banner as promoting illegal drug use in contravention of the school’s drug abuse prevention policy.⁸⁴ The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed, finding that school officials had ⁷⁹ Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 397 (2007).

⁸⁰ Id. A photograph of the banner being displayed can be found at Bong Hits 4 Jesus’ Case Heads to High Court, NBCNEWS, http://www.nbcnews.com/id/17648725/ns/us_news-life/t/bong-hits-jesus-case-heads-high-court#.WOJBw2_yvIU [<https://perma.cc/CG24-J964>].

⁸¹ Morse, 551 U.S. at 398.

⁸² Id.

⁸³ Id. at 399.

⁸⁴ Frederick v. Morse, No. J 02-008 CV, 2003 WL 25274689 (D. Alaska, May 29, 2003), rev’d, 551 U.S. 393 (2007).

been unable to establish that the student's speech materially disrupted the school environment.⁸⁵

The Supreme Court reversed the Ninth Circuit, holding that the discipline had been constitutionally imposed.⁸⁶ In so holding, the Court first addressed the student's argument that the case was not a "school speech case" because the student was not on school grounds.⁸⁷ The Court summarily rejected that argument, stating that the student could not "stand in the midst of his fellow students, during school hours, at a school-sanctioned activity and claim he is not at school."⁸⁸ Although the Court found that the particular facts of the case fell squarely within the student speech cases, the Court did acknowledge that "[t]here is some uncertainty at the outer boundaries as to when courts should apply school speech precedents."⁸⁹ Although the Court did not clarify this statement further, it seems that the Court was acknowledging that school authority over student speech does extend, to some unidentified point, beyond the student's physical presence on school grounds.

Having disposed with the student's argument that his speech was beyond the authority of school officials, the Court next turned to the issue of whether school officials had acted within constitutional limits. The Court again affirmed that students do not lose their First Amendment rights at school, but noted that the "nature of those rights is what is appropriate for children in school."⁹⁰ Returning to the debate that had taken place twenty years earlier between the Justices who decided both Fraser and Kuhlmeier, the Court in Morse noted that, while the "mode of analysis employed in Fraser [was] not entirely clear,"⁹¹ it could discern two important principles from the decision. First, due to the "special characteristics of the school environment," the First Amendment rights of students may be regulated in ways that would not be constitutional if imposed upon either adults or students in other settings.⁹² The Court thus affirmed Justice ⁸⁵ Frederick v. Morse, 439 F.3d 1114, 1117 (9th Cir. 2006), rev'd, 551 U.S. 393 (2007).

⁸⁶ Morse, 551 U.S. at 410.

⁸⁷ Id. at 400.

⁸⁸ Id. at 401.

⁸⁹ Id. (citing Porter v. Ascension Parish Sch. Bd., 393 F.3d 608, 615 n.22 (5th Cir. 2004)).

⁹⁰ Id. at 406 (quoting Vernonia School Dist. 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646, 655–56 (1995)).

⁹¹ Id. at 404.

⁹² Id. at 404–05.

Brennan's conclusion that the student in Fraser could not have been disciplined by school officials had he given the speech outside of the "school context."⁹³ Second, notwithstanding Justice Brennan's concurrence in Fraser and later dissent in Kuhlmeier, the Court in Morse found that, in Fraser, the Court did not "conduct the 'substantial disruption' analysis prescribed by Tinker."⁹⁴ Thus, the Court made clear that Fraser had established a content-based category of unprotected student speech under which lewd or indecent speech uttered at school is subject to discipline.

The Court in Morse also reviewed its decision in Kuhlmeier and reaffirmed that school officials do not violate the First Amendment by exercising control over student speech expressed in school-sponsored activities as long as the regulation is "reasonably related to legitimate pedagogical concerns."⁹⁵ Further, the Court interpreted the decision in Kuhlmeier to be consistent with Fraser in two important respects. First, school officials have the ability to regulate student speech at school in ways that they "could not censor similar speech outside the school."⁹⁶ Second, the substantial disruption standard of Tinker "is not the only basis for restricting student speech."⁹⁷

Having concluded that the Court's precedents allowed for the creation of certain categories of regulated student speech, the Court then created an additional content-based category by allowing restrictions on student speech that could reasonably be interpreted as promoting illegal drug use.⁹⁸

Justice Alito concurred in the Court's decision in Morse, but added a significant note of caution. Specifically, Justice Alito wrote separately to reject the argument made by school officials that they were entitled to restrict any student speech

⁹³ Id. at 405.

⁹⁴ Id. (citing Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260, 271 n.4 (1988) (the majority in Kuhlmeier voiced disagreement with Justice Brennan in terms of the analysis conducted in Fraser)).

⁹⁵ Id. at 405.

⁹⁶ Id. at 406.

⁹⁷ Id.

⁹⁸ Id. at 408. Justice Thomas concurred in the result, writing separately to argue that Tinker is unconstitutional because "the history of public education suggests that the First Amendment, as originally understood, does not protect student speech in public schools." Id. at 410–11 (Thomas, J., concurring). This argument is firmly grounded in the physicality of being at school, where school officials are deemed to be standing "in loco parentis" when children are at school. Id. at 419. Thus, under Justice Thomas's interpretation of the First Amendment, school officials should have no ability to regulate student speech that occurs outside of school, where the children's parents have the ability to control and discipline them.

that “interferes with a school’s ‘educational mission.’”⁹⁹ Justice Alito wisely recognized the dangerousness of such a position, since any particular school’s educational mission could be defined—and re-defined—to fit the political, social, or moral views of particular administrators.¹⁰⁰ He emphasized that the Court’s ruling in favor of school officials was not premised on authority to regulate student speech that interfered with an educational mission but, rather, on the specific and special characteristics of the school setting. On the facts before the Court, the “threat to the physical safety of students”¹⁰¹ was an important characteristic of the school environment that had been implicated by the arguably pro-drug-use banner. Employing language that is particularly relevant when one considers the threats of violence such as school shootings, Justice Alito stated:

School attendance can expose students to threats to their physical safety that they would not otherwise face. Outside of school, parents can attempt to protect their children in many ways and may take steps to monitor and exercise control over the persons with whom their children associate. Similarly, students, when not in school, may be able to avoid threatening individuals and situations. During school hours, however, parents are not present to provide protection and guidance, and students’ movements and their ability to choose the persons with whom they spend time are severely restricted. Students may be compelled on a daily basis to spend time at close quarters with other students who may do them harm. Experience shows that schools can be places of special danger.¹⁰²

Justice Alito concluded that, in cases involving threats of violence, school officials “must have greater authority to intervene” in order to protect students.¹⁰³ He specifically cited Tinker’s substantial disruption standard as providing authority for school officials to intervene “before actual violence erupts.”¹⁰⁴

In deciding these four student speech cases over nearly forty years, the Court failed to articulate a cohesive test regarding students’ free speech rights. Rather, in each case decided after Tinker, the Court issued narrow decisions that were highly specific to the facts before it. As a result, even ⁹⁹ Id. at 423 (Alito, J., concurring) (quoting Brief of the Petitioners at 21, Morse, 551 U.S. 393 (No. 06-278), 2007 WL 118979; Brief for United States as Amicus Curiae Supporting Petitioners at 6, Morse, 551 U.S. 393 (No. 06-278), 2007 WL 118978).

¹⁰⁰ Id.

¹⁰¹ Id. at 424.

¹⁰² Id.

¹⁰³ Id. at 425.

¹⁰⁴ Id. (citing Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 508–09 (1969)).

before the advent of the digital age, school officials had very little guidance to address student speech issues when the facts deviated from those of the decided cases. As discussed below, however, the digital age has brought new complexities to the issue of students' free speech rights. The lack of a cohesive and flexible framework from the Court has caused disarray and disagreement among the lower federal courts.

II. THE CIRCUIT COURTS ENTER THE DIGITAL AGE

A. The Second Circuit Establishes a "Reasonable Foreseeability" Test

Less than two weeks after the Supreme Court decided Morse, a case involving student speech appearing on a crudely made, hand-painted sign, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals decided a case involving student speech using an entirely different mode of communication—an electronic “instant message” (IM) distributed via the Internet.¹⁰⁵ Thus, only days after the decision in Morse, the lower federal courts embarked on the difficult task of applying the Supreme Court's “twentieth century” student speech cases to the predominant “twenty-first century” mode of communication—speech that is created and distributed electronically.

In Wisniewski v. Board of Education of the Weedsport Central School District, the parents of an eighth-grade student sued the school district after their son was disciplined for transmitting to other students an IM icon with a drawing depicting the shooting of the student's English teacher.¹⁰⁶ The student argued that, because he had created and distributed the IM entirely outside of school via electronic means, his speech was beyond the authority of school officials.¹⁰⁷ The Second Circuit rejected that argument, holding that school officials did have the authority over the student's off-campus speech because it was a “reasonably foreseeable risk that the [IM] icon would come to the attention of school authorities” or “reach”¹⁰⁸ the school property. In developing this “reasonable foreseeability” test, the Second Circuit became the first federal ¹⁰⁵ Wisniewski ex rel. Wisniewski v. Bd. of Educ. of Weedsport Cent. Sch. Dist., 494 F.3d 34, 35 (2d Cir. 2007).

¹⁰⁶ Id.

¹⁰⁷ Id. at 39 (The creation of the IM outside of school did not “insulate [the student] from discipline.”).

¹⁰⁸ Id. at 38–39.

appellate court to address the scope of school authority over student off-campus electronic speech.

After determining that school officials had authority over the student's speech because it was reasonably foreseeable that the speech would come to the attention of school authorities, the Second Circuit applied the Tinker test and determined that school officials had reasonably forecast a substantial disruption. The court first examined the question whether the student's speech constituted a "true threat" under the Supreme Court's decision in Watts v. United States.¹⁰⁹ In Watts, the Court held that a federal statute criminalizing threats against the President of the United States required the government to establish that the speech constituted a "true threat."¹¹⁰ The Second Circuit concluded that it need not consider whether to apply Watts because, in its view, Tinker's substantial disruption standard granted school officials "significantly broader authority to sanction student speech than the Watts standard allows."¹¹¹ Irrespective of the true threat analysis, student speech that advocated violence against a teacher had the potential to materially and substantially disrupt the school environment.¹¹²

However, the three-judge panel in Wisniewski struggled with the proper test to determine whether Tinker applied to student speech created and distributed outside of school. The "panel [was] divided"¹¹³ about whether, in the case of off-campus speech, school officials were required to make any additional showing about the speech's connection to the school environment or whether that issue was unnecessary in light of the fact that the speech had been viewed by school officials. While noting the panel's disagreement, the Second Circuit held, on the specific facts before it, that it was "reasonably foreseeable that the IM icon would come to the attention of school authorities,"¹¹⁴ thus providing authority for school officials to discipline the student under Tinker. The requirement of reasonable foreseeability—"both [of] communication to school authorities . . . and the risk of substantial disruption"¹¹⁵—was satisfied because of the ¹⁰⁹ Id. at 37–38 (discussing Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705 (1969)).

¹¹⁰ Id.

¹¹¹ Id. at 38.

¹¹² Id. at 39.

¹¹³ Id.

¹¹⁴ Id.

¹¹⁵ Id. at 40.

threatening content of the IM icon and its “extensive distribution”¹¹⁶ to fifteen other students.

Thus, Wisniewski established a “threshold”¹¹⁷ test that school officials must satisfy before the Tinker analysis is undertaken in cases involving students’ off-campus electronic speech. This threshold test requires school officials to demonstrate a “reasonable foreseeability” that a student’s off-campus speech would come to the attention of school authorities or otherwise “reach” campus before discipline could be imposed.

In March 2008, the Supreme Court denied a petition for a writ of certiorari that had been filed in Wisniewski.¹¹⁸

In a case decided one year later, the Second Circuit again applied its “reasonable foreseeability” test to determine whether school officials could exercise authority over a student’s electronic off-campus speech. In Doninger v. Niehoff, a student who was a member of student government was disciplined after she posted a message on a publicly accessible blog that contained misleading information and derogatory language about an upcoming school event, a “battle-of-the-bands” concert.¹¹⁹ The student erroneously told the school community that the concert had been canceled “due to douchebags in central office”¹²⁰ and urged students and parents to flood the school’s administrative offices with complaints via email or telephone, with the expressed goal of “piss[ing] [school officials] off more.”¹²¹ Due to the student’s efforts, school administrators did receive a deluge of complaints from students and parents, which caused school administrators to spend significant time both in rescheduling the concert and correcting misinformation distributed by the student.¹²²

Some days after the incident, the student’s blog posting was brought to the attention of the school superintendent, whose adult son found the posting on the Internet.¹²³ At the time, school officials took no action; however, approximately three weeks later, when the student took steps to accept a nomination to serve as Senior Class Secretary, the school

¹¹⁶ Id. at 39.

¹¹⁷ Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2013) (characterizing the Second Circuit’s decision as establishing a “threshold test”).

¹¹⁸ Wisniewski ex rel. Wisniewski v. Bd. of Educ. of the Weedsport Cent. Sch. Dist., cert. denied, 552 U.S. 1296 (2008).

¹¹⁹ Doninger v. Niehoff, 527 F.3d 41, 44 (2d Cir. 2008).

¹²⁰ Id. at 45.

¹²¹ Id.

¹²² Id. at 45–46.

¹²³ Id. at 46.

principal determined that the student should be prohibited from running for that office as discipline for her speech.¹²⁴

The student's mother then sued. The federal district court denied the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, finding that the plaintiff had not demonstrated a sufficient likelihood of success on the merits,¹²⁵ and the plaintiff appealed to the Second Circuit.

The Second Circuit first noted that the Supreme Court had not yet addressed the "scope of a school's authority"¹²⁶ over student off-campus speech. Relying on its earlier decision in Wisniewski, the court then articulated two, slightly different "foreseeability tests" to determine the scope of school authority over off-campus speech. First, the court stated that a student may be disciplined for off-campus speech that "would foreseeably create a risk of substantial disruption within the school environment' at least when it was similarly foreseeable that the off-campus expression might also reach campus."¹²⁷ Later in the opinion, the court stated that school discipline is permissible when "it [is] reasonably foreseeable that the [speech will] come to the attention of school authorities and that it would create a risk of substantial disruption."¹²⁸

The court did not explain whether the two articulations—authority over off-campus speech that either "reach[es] campus"¹²⁹ or "come[s] to the attention of school authorities"¹³⁰—are in fact the same measure or test.¹³¹ Compounding the confusion, the Second Circuit applied both articulations to the facts of the case. The court first stated that "it was reasonably foreseeable that [the blog] posting would reach school property."¹³² Later in the same paragraph, the court stated that "it was reasonably foreseeable that . . . school administrators would be aware of [the blog posting]."¹³³ Based on these two, slightly different articulations, the Second Circuit

¹²⁴ Id.

¹²⁵ Doninger v. Niehoff, 514 F. Supp. 2d 199 (D. Conn. 2007), aff'd, 527 F.3d 41 (2d Cir. 2008).

¹²⁶ Doninger, 527 F.3d at 48.

¹²⁷ Id.

¹²⁸ Id. at 50.

¹²⁹ Id. at 48.

¹³⁰ Id. at 50.

¹³¹ By using both articulations, the decision in Doninger essentially continued the debate begun among the judges in the Wisniewski case about whether the speech actually had to reach school property or whether it was sufficient that it was reasonably foreseeable that speech would reach school property. See supra notes 113–116.

¹³² Doninger, 527 F.3d at 50.

¹³³ Id.

concluded that school officials had authority over the student's off-campus speech.

The Second Circuit then concluded that school officials had correctly applied Tinker.¹³⁴ The court did not find that an actual substantial disruption had occurred at school, only that the student's speech had created a foreseeable risk of a future disruption. The court cited three reasons for this finding.¹³⁵ First, the court found that the student's use of "plainly offensive" language—such as calling school officials "douchebags"—inflamed the controversy rather than resolved it.¹³⁶ Second, the student's misleading characterization of the controversy led to a "deluge of calls or emails" that caused school officials to "miss or be late to school-related activities" and could have caused further disruption had it continued.¹³⁷ Third, the court found that the student's position as a student government leader warranted discipline because her behavior was potentially disruptive of student government functions.¹³⁸

After the Second Circuit affirmed the district court's denial of plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, the case continued to be litigated in the federal courts. In January 2009, the federal district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment as to the student's First Amendment claim premised on her blog posting.¹³⁹ The Second Circuit affirmed in part and reversed in part the grant of summary judgment.¹⁴⁰ The Supreme Court then denied the student's petition for a writ of certiorari.¹⁴¹

B. The Third Circuit Avoids the Scope of Authority Issue, but Members of the Court Have Strong Differences of Opinion

Shortly after the Second Circuit issued its decision in Doninger, the Third Circuit began to wrestle with the scope of ¹³⁴ Id. at 50.

¹³⁵ Id. at 50–52.

¹³⁶ Id. at 50–51.

¹³⁷ Id. at 51.

¹³⁸ Id. at 52.

¹³⁹ Doninger v. Niehoff, 594 F. Supp. 2d 211 (D. Conn. 2009), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, 642 F.3d 334 (2d Cir. 2011) (defendants' motion for summary judgment granted in part and denied in part; the court denied summary judgment only as to a First Amendment claim stemming from the school district's determination that other students could not wear "Team Avery" T-shirts in support of the plaintiff).

¹⁴⁰ Doninger v. Niehoff, 642 F.3d 334 (2d Cir. 2011).

¹⁴¹ Doninger v. Niehoff, 565 U.S. 976 (2011) (mem).

school authority over student off-campus electronic speech.¹⁴² In 2011, the Third Circuit, sitting en banc, decided two student off-campus speech cases that had remarkably similar facts. However, the Third Circuit's twin decisions did not clarify the constitutional limits of school officials' authority to discipline students for off-campus electronic speech. To the contrary, the decisions revealed a deep divide among the judges on the issue.

In the first case, Layshock v. Hermitage School District, a high school senior, Justin Layshock, used his grandmother's home computer to create a "parody profile" of the school principal that Layshock then posted on MySpace.com.¹⁴³ The parody profile contained numerous outlandish statements purportedly written by the principal.¹⁴⁴ In creating the profile, Layshock copied a photograph of the principal from the district's website, which he then used in the parody profile.¹⁴⁵ In addition, there was some evidence that Layshock had accessed the profile on a school computer and showed it to a few students during school hours.¹⁴⁶

A few days after he posted this profile, the principal learned of its existence from his daughter, who had heard about the profile at school.¹⁴⁷ Finding the profile to be "degrading" and "shocking,"¹⁴⁸ the principal asked the school to commence an investigation, which ultimately identified Layshock as the creator of a profile of the principal.¹⁴⁹ The district disciplined Layshock for violating the school code of conduct, including prohibitions on the use of obscene ¹⁴² Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 205, 212 (3d Cir. 2011) (en banc); J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915, 925 (3d Cir. 2011).

¹⁴³ Layshock, 650 F.3d at 208–09.

¹⁴⁴ Id. at 208. The parody profile included the following statements, among others:

In the past month have you been on pills: big pills
 In the past month have you gone Skinny Dipping: big lake, not big dick
 In the past month have you Stolen Anything: big keg
 Ever been drunk: big number of times
 Ever been called a Tease: big whore
 Ever been Beaten up: big fag
 Ever Shoplifted: big bag of kmart
 Number of Drugs I have taken: big.

Id.

¹⁴⁵ Id. at 207–08.

¹⁴⁶ Id. at 209. After Layshock first posted his profile, other students created and posted at least three additional profiles of the principal, all of which were more vulgar than Layshock's parody profile. Id. at 208.

¹⁴⁷ Id.

¹⁴⁸ Id. at 209.

¹⁴⁹ Id. at 208–09.

language.¹⁵⁰ Layshock was given a ten-day suspension, sent to an alternative education program for the remainder of his senior year, banned from all extracurricular activities, and prohibited from attending his graduation ceremony.¹⁵¹

Layshock and his parents sued.¹⁵² The federal district court granted summary judgment in Layschock's favor on a First Amendment claim.¹⁵³ A three-judge panel of the Third Circuit then affirmed.¹⁵⁴ The court found discipline was not warranted under Fraser because no lewd or obscene language had been used at school.¹⁵⁵ The court also reiterated the lower court's ruling that the school had not presented evidence of any substantial disruption sufficient to allow discipline under Tinker, a finding that the school district had not challenged on appeal.¹⁵⁶ However, the panel opinion was vacated pending a rehearing of the case by the Third Circuit sitting en banc.¹⁵⁷

In June 2011, the Third Circuit issued its en banc decision in which it unanimously affirmed the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of Layshock.¹⁵⁸ The Third Circuit framed the issue presented in the case as follows:

We are asked to determine if a school district can punish a student for expressive conduct that originated outside of the schoolhouse, did not disturb the school environment and was not related to any school sponsored event. We hold that, under these circumstances, the First Amendment prohibits the school from reaching beyond the schoolyard to impose what might otherwise be appropriate discipline.¹⁵⁹

At the outset, the Third Circuit noted that, on appeal, the school district had abandoned any argument that its discipline of Layshock was constitutional under Tinker.¹⁶⁰ Rather than relying on Tinker, the school district argued that ¹⁵⁰ Id. at 209–10.

¹⁵¹ Id. at 210.

¹⁵² Id.

¹⁵³ Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 496 F. Supp. 2d 587, 606 (W.D. Pa. 2007).

¹⁵⁴ Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 593 F.3d 249 (3d Cir. 2010).

¹⁵⁵ Id. at 260–63.

¹⁵⁶ Id. at 260–61. The Third Circuit noted that the school district had not disputed on appeal the district court's finding that it had failed to provide sufficient evidence of a substantial disruption as would be necessary to constitutionally discipline a student under Tinker. Id. at 261.

¹⁵⁷ Layshock, 593 F.3d 249.

¹⁵⁸ Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 205 (3d Cir. 2011).

¹⁵⁹ Id. at 207.

¹⁶⁰ Id. at 214. In granting summary judgment in favor of Layshock, the district court stated that the school district could not establish a “nexus” between the parody profile and any substantial disruption at school. Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 496 F. Supp. 2d 587, 600 (W.D. Pa. 2007).

its discipline of Layshock was constitutional under Fraser.¹⁶¹ The school district acknowledged that Fraser was limited to the use of lewd and obscene language at school; however, the district argued that Layshock's act of entering the district's website to cut and paste the principal's picture constituted an entry into school property sufficient to treat the profile as on-campus speech.¹⁶² The school district also argued that it was "reasonably foreseeable" that the profile would come to the attention of school authorities, thus employing the language of Doninger.¹⁶³ In making this argument, the school district sought to broaden the scope of school authority to include discipline under Fraser for any off-campus lewd or offensive speech so long as it reasonably could be foreseen that the lewd speech would come to the attention of school authorities.

The Third Circuit rejected this argument.¹⁶⁴ It distinguished Doninger specifically on the ground that the Second Circuit had applied the foreseeability test to determine scope of authority to discipline a student for substantially disruptive speech under Tinker.¹⁶⁵ In addition, the Third Circuit was quite clear that it had discussed Doninger only because the district raised the argument and, importantly, that it did not necessarily endorse the Second Circuit's position, stating, "[I]n citing Doninger, we do not suggest that we agree with that court's conclusion that the student's out of school expressive conduct was not protected by the First Amendment there."¹⁶⁶ Ultimately the Third Circuit concluded that Fraser clearly applied only to the lewd or obscene speech uttered at school and that school officials had no authority to impose discipline for a student's lewd speech created and posted electronically outside of school.¹⁶⁷

While the en banc decision in Layshock was unanimous, the judges of the Third Circuit clearly did not agree on the scope of authority question. That disagreement was apparent in the second student speech opinion that the court issued simultaneously with the Layshock decision.¹⁶⁸ In the second case, J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain School District, the court

¹⁶¹ Layshock, 650 F.3d at 216–17.

¹⁶² Id. at 214, 216.

¹⁶³ Id.

¹⁶⁴ Id. at 219.

¹⁶⁵ Id. at 217–18.

¹⁶⁶ Id. at 218.

¹⁶⁷ Id. at 219.

¹⁶⁸ See J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915 (3d Cir. 2011).

ruled eight to six in favor of the student, although five of the eight majority judges joined in a separate concurring opinion.¹⁶⁹

In Snyder, as in Layshock, the student—identified as J.S.—had created an obscenity-laced fake profile of the school principal that J.S. then posted on MySpace.¹⁷⁰ J.S. created the profile outside of school and, although it was briefly publicly available, J.S. changed the accessibility of the profile to “private,” thus limiting access to about twenty-two other students who were “friends” on MySpace.¹⁷¹ The principal learned of the profile from another student and, due to the private setting in MySpace, was able to review its contents only after asking that student to print out a copy of the profile and bring it to school.¹⁷² After reviewing the profile, the principal and other school officials disciplined J.S.¹⁷³

She and her parents then sued, claiming a violation of her First Amendment rights.¹⁷⁴ Unlike the Layshock case, the federal district court determined that the school’s discipline of J.S. had been constitutional under Fraser because the speech was lewd and vulgar and, although created off-campus, had an on-campus effect.¹⁷⁵ A three-judge panel of the Third Circuit first affirmed the district court’s ruling, then vacated the decision pending a rehearing en banc.¹⁷⁶ After additional briefing and oral argument, a narrow majority of the Third Circuit reversed the lower court’s ruling on the First Amendment issue and remanded the case to the lower court for further proceedings.¹⁷⁷

The majority in Snyder avoided the central issue of whether school officials have authority to discipline students for off-campus speech, stating that it would “assume, without deciding, that Tinker applies to” off-campus speech.¹⁷⁸ In other ¹⁶⁹ See id. at 936–41 (Smith, J., concurring).

¹⁷⁰ Id. at 920–21 (majority opinion). The profile was written as if it described the life of a “bi-sexual Alabama middle school principal named ‘M-Hoe.’” Id. at 920. The profile listed the fictitious principal’s interests as: “detention, being a tight ass, riding the fraintain, spending time with my child (who looks like a gorilla), baseball, my golden pen, fucking in my office, hitting on students and their parents.” Id.

¹⁷¹ Id. at 921.

¹⁷² Id.

¹⁷³ Id. at 922.

¹⁷⁴ J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., No. 3:07cv585, 2008 WL 4279517, at *3 (M.D. Pa. Sept. 11, 2008).

¹⁷⁵ Id. at *6–7. The federal district court distinguished the district court’s decision in Layshock, which had found no constitutional basis for discipline, on the ground that the profile created by J.S. was “much more vulgar and offensive.” Id. at *8.

¹⁷⁶ J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 593 F.3d 286, 286 (3d Cir. 2010).

¹⁷⁷ Snyder, 650 F.3d at 920. The court did affirm the district court’s judgments that the district’s policies were not void for vagueness and that the defendants did not violate any Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights. Id.

¹⁷⁸ Id. at 926.

words, the court treated the student's speech as on-campus speech contemplated in Tinker. The majority did note the student's argument that school officials' ability to discipline students was limited to the schoolhouse and acknowledged that the argument had "some appeal," but deemed it unnecessary to reach the issue in order to decide in the student's favor.¹⁷⁹ Rather, the majority found that, even assuming that Tinker applied, the district had not presented any evidence of a substantial disruption that would warrant the discipline imposed on J.S.¹⁸⁰ The majority also determined that the lower court had erred in applying Fraser to the student's speech, stating that "Fraser's 'lewdness' standard [could not] be extended to justify a school's punishment of J.S. for use of profane language outside the school, during non-school hours."¹⁸¹

Judge D. Brooks Smith wrote a concurring opinion, joined by four other judges, in which he directly addressed the scope of authority question avoided by the majority.¹⁸² Judge Smith opined that school officials should have very limited authority over students' off-campus speech, stating that "the First Amendment protects students engaging in off-campus speech to the same extent it protects speech by citizens in the community at large."¹⁸³ Using the Supreme Court's own language, Judge Smith concluded that "Tinker's holding is expressly grounded in 'the special characteristics of the school environment'"¹⁸⁴ and grants limited authority to "prescribe and control conduct in the schools."¹⁸⁵ He predicted dire consequences if the authority granted to school officials under Tinker was extended too far, stating:

Applying Tinker to off-campus speech would create a precedent with ominous implications. Doing so would empower schools to regulate students' expressive activity no matter where it takes place, when it occurs, or what subject matter it involves—so long as it causes a substantial disruption at school. . . . Suppose a high school student, while at home after school hours, were to write a blog entry defending gay marriage. Suppose further that several of the ¹⁷⁹ Id. at 926 n.3.

¹⁸⁰ Id. at 928.

¹⁸¹ Id. at 932.

¹⁸² Id. at 936 (Smith, J., concurring).

¹⁸³ Id.

¹⁸⁴ Id. at 937 (quoting Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 506 (1969)).

¹⁸⁵ Id. (quoting Tinker, 393 U.S. at 507). Judge Smith argued that, in Morse, Justice Alito himself had recognized that Tinker did not extend to off-campus speech, noting Justice Alito's statement that "Tinker allows schools to regulate 'in-school student speech . . . in a way that would not be constitutional in other settings.'" Id. at 938 (omission in original) (quoting Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 422 (2007) (Alito, J., concurring)).

student's classmates got wind of the entry, took issue with it, and caused a significant disturbance at school. While the school could clearly punish the students who acted disruptively, if Tinker were held to apply to off-campus speech, the school could also punish the student whose blog entry brought about the disruption. That cannot be, nor is it, the law.¹⁸⁶

As Judge Smith framed the issue, the difficult question was not whether Tinker could extend to "off-campus" speech but how to define whether a student's electronic speech has taken place either "on" or "off" campus.¹⁸⁷ Using the example of a student who might email a teacher from home, Judge Smith opined that speech by a student that is "intentionally directed towards a school" would be considered "on-campus" speech and thus subject to the authority of school officials.¹⁸⁸

Yet Judge Smith soundly rejected the Second Circuit's foreseeability test, stating that "[a] bare foreseeability standard could be stretched too far, and would risk ensnaring any off-campus expression that happened to discuss school-related matters."¹⁸⁹ He rejected the notion that truly off-campus speech somehow "mutate[s] into on-campus speech" by reaching the campus.¹⁹⁰ As to the fake profile created by J.S., Judge Smith determined that the profile did not constitute on-campus speech that was subject to discipline under Tinker.¹⁹¹

As stated above, the Third Circuit was highly divided in the Snyder case. Six of the fourteen judges dissented from the decision to affirm the lower court's ruling on the First Amendment issue.¹⁹² The dissenting judges applied Tinker to the student's speech, arguing that school officials could have reasonably forecasted a future disruption due to the student's speech.¹⁹³ In particular, the dissenting judges forcefully argued that "personal and harmful attacks on educators and school officials" are always disruptive to the school community.¹⁹⁴ A great deal of the dissenting opinion was devoted specifically to outlining reasons why students ought to be subject to discipline

¹⁸⁶ Id. at 939.

¹⁸⁷ Id. at 940 ("[H]ow can one tell whether speech takes place on or off campus?").

¹⁸⁸ Id.

¹⁸⁹ Id.

¹⁹⁰ Id.

¹⁹¹ Id. at 940. Among the facts demonstrating that the speech was entirely off campus were: it had been created outside of school, had not been sent by the student to any school employee, had been accessible only to a limited number of individuals due to the private setting in MySpace, and that school computers blocked access to MySpace. Id.

¹⁹² Id. at 941 (Fisher, J., dissenting).

¹⁹³ Id. at 945.

¹⁹⁴ Id. at 946.

for “off-campus hostile and offensive student internet speech that is directed at school officials.”¹⁹⁵ And the dissenters also opined that school authority should extend to speech created by students outside of school due to the “near-constant student access to social networking sites on and off campus.”¹⁹⁶

Indeed, in the view of some Third Circuit judges, the two decisions in Layshock and Snyder were “competing opinions”¹⁹⁷ that created uncertainty on the scope of authority issue.¹⁹⁸ Judge Kent A. Jordan wrote a concurring opinion in Layshock specifically to assert his strong view that, under Tinker, school officials could exercise authority over a student’s off-campus speech.¹⁹⁹ Judge Jordan used somewhat strong language to criticize two of the opinions in Snyder. He criticized the majority in Snyder for failing to address the scope of authority question and simply “assuming” that Tinker applied.²⁰⁰ Judge Smith’s position was criticized on the ground that the “‘off-campus versus on-campus’ distinction is artificial and untenable in the world we live in today.”²⁰¹

Judge Jordan found that the “omnipresence”²⁰² of speech communicated via “wireless internet access, smart phones, tablet computers, social networking services like Facebook, and stream-of-consciousness communications via Twitter”²⁰³ renders any rule based on “physical boundaries of a school campus”²⁰⁴ unworkable. Judge Jordan advocated that school officials be given broad authority to “forecast how poisonous accusations lobbed over the internet are likely to play out within the school community” and to impose discipline whenever school officials might reasonable forecast a disruption.²⁰⁵ Although he did make note of the Supreme Court’s reference to an “uncertainty at the outer boundaries” of what constitutes speech subject to school authority, Judge Jordan made no effort to define that outer boundary or ¹⁹⁵ Id. at 950.

¹⁹⁶ Id. at 951–52.

¹⁹⁷ Layshock ex rel. Layschock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 205, 220 (3d Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Jordan, J., concurring).

¹⁹⁸ For a detailed discussion of the disagreement among the Third Circuit judges, including a tabular description of the judges’ positions in Snyder, see Watt Lesley Black, Jr., Omnipresent Student Speech and the Schoolhouse Gate: Interpreting Tinker in the Digital Age, 59 ST. LOUIS U. L.J. 531, 541 tbl.1 (2015).

¹⁹⁹ Layshock, 650 F.3d at 219–22 (Jordan, J., concurring).

²⁰⁰ Id. at 220.

²⁰¹ Id. (citing Snyder, 650 F.3d at 915, 947–48, n.4 (Fisher, J., dissenting)).

²⁰² Id. at 221.

²⁰³ Id. at 220.

²⁰⁴ Id. at 221.

²⁰⁵ Id. at 222.

otherwise articulate a limitation on the scope of the authority of school officials.²⁰⁶

The Third Circuit's twin decisions in Layshock and Snyder only created further division and confusion among the federal appellate courts regarding the appropriate framework under which to analyze First Amendment claims involving students' off-campus speech.²⁰⁷ And, as it had with earlier cases, the Supreme Court denied petitions for writs of certiorari that had been filed in both Snyder and Layshock, thus again foregoing the opportunity to address a student electronic speech case.²⁰⁸

C. The Fourth and Eighth Circuits Adopt the Second Circuit's "Reasonable Foreseeability" Test

In a decision issued just one month after the Third Circuit's fractured rulings in Layshock and Snyder, the Fourth Circuit continued to complicate the scope of authority over student electronic speech in a case that involved cyberbullying.²⁰⁹ A high school student, Kara Kowalski, had created a discussion group webpage entitled "S.A.S.H.," which other students recognized as an acronym for the phrase "Students Against Shay's Herpes," where "Shay" referred to another student at school.²¹⁰ Kowalski then invited about one hundred of her social media "friends" to join the group.²¹¹ Approximately two-dozen high school students did join the group and many of them posted derogatory comments and photographs of Shay, the target of the webpage.²¹² School officials were unaware of the page until it was brought to their attention by Shay's parents.²¹³

After conducting an investigation, school officials determined that the student had violated the school's written bullying and harassment policy and punished her by, among other things, issuing a ninety-day social suspension and ²⁰⁶ Id. at 220 n.2 (citing Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 401 (2007)).

²⁰⁷ Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1068–69 (9th Cir. 2013) (discussing various approaches of federal appellate courts).

²⁰⁸ Blue Mountain Sch. Dist. v. J.S. ex rel. Snyder, 650 F.3d 915, cert. denied, 565 U.S. 1156 (2012); Layshock, 650 F.3d 205, cert. denied, 565 U.S. 1156 (2012).

²⁰⁹ Kowalski v. Berkeley Cty. Sch., 652 F.3d 565 (4th Cir. 2011).

²¹⁰ Id. at 567.

²¹¹ Id.

²¹² Id. at 567–68. One student posted photographs of Shay. Id. at 568. On one photograph, he drew red dots on the girl's face to simulate herpes. Id. In another photograph of Shay, he added a caption that read, "portrait of a whore." Id.

²¹³ Id.

prohibiting her from participating on the cheerleading squad for the remainder of the school year.²¹⁴

The student then sued both the school district and several school officials, asserting both First Amendment and Due Process claims.²¹⁵ After the federal district court dismissed all claims,²¹⁶ the student appealed, claiming that “school administrators had no power to discipline her” because her speech had been created and distributed off campus.²¹⁷ Citing the Second Circuit’s decision in Doninger, school officials argued that school officials had authority over the student’s speech because it was foreseeable that the speech would “reach the school.”²¹⁸ The Fourth Circuit affirmed the district court’s ruling, finding that school officials did have authority over the student’s speech and that the discipline had comported with Tinker.²¹⁹

However, the rationale behind the Fourth Circuit’s determination on the scope of authority issue was somewhat unclear. In addressing the scope of authority question, the Fourth Circuit stated:

There is surely a limit to the scope of a high school’s interest in the order, safety, and well-being of its students when the speech at issue originates outside the schoolhouse gate. But we need not fully define that limit here, as we are satisfied that the nexus of Kowalski’s speech to Musselman High School’s pedagogical interests was sufficiently strong to justify the action taken by school officials in carrying out their role as the trustees of the student body’s well-being.²²⁰

The Fourth Circuit’s use of the word “nexus” has led some courts and commentators to conclude that, on the scope of authority issue, the Fourth Circuit had created a different test than the foreseeability test articulated in Doninger.²²¹ This so-called “nexus” test apparently examines the strength of the ²¹⁴ Id. at 568–69.

²¹⁵ Id. at 567.

²¹⁶ Id.

²¹⁷ Id. at 570–71.

²¹⁸ Id. at 571.

²¹⁹ Id. at 577.

²²⁰ Id. at 573.

²²¹ Wynar v. Douglas Cnty. Sch. Dist., 782 F.3d 1062, 1068 (9th Cir. 2013); Margaret A. Hazel, Student Cyber-Speech After Kowalski v. Berkeley County Schools, 63 S.C. L. REV. 1081, 1087 (2012) (describing Kowalski as adopting a “sufficient nexus approach”); Daniel Marcus-Toll, Tinker Gone Viral: Diverging Threshold Tests for Analyzing School Regulation of Off-Campus Digital Student Speech, 82 FORDHAM L. REV. 3395 (2014); Mary Noe, Sticks and Stones Will Break My Bones but Whether Words Harm Will Be Decided by a Judge, N.Y. ST. BAR J., Jan. 2016, at 39. But see Black, supra note 198, at 551 (“The Second, Fourth, and Eighth Circuits all considered the question of the reasonable foreseeability that a student’s off-campus speech would reach the school before extending Tinker to off-campus speech.”).

connection between the speech and school.²²² And yet, nowhere in the opinion did the Fourth Circuit say either that it disagreed with the Doninger test or that it was crafting a different test on the scope of authority issue. Also absent was any discussion of the facts or factors by which a sufficient nexus could be established in student speech cases generally or in the specific case itself. Thus, if the Fourth Circuit had intended to adopt a “nexus” test for off-campus speech that differed from Doninger, it failed to define that test.²²³

In fact, rather than rejecting the reasoning of Doninger, the Fourth Circuit discussed Doninger at length and actually applied the foreseeability test.²²⁴ The opinion included a lengthy paragraph in which the court described Doninger and quoted the Second Circuit’s conclusion that discipline is appropriate when “it [i]s . . . foreseeable that the off-campus expression might . . . reach campus.”²²⁵ The Fourth Circuit then applied the reasonable foreseeability test to the facts before it, finding that “it was foreseeable in this case that Kowalski’s conduct would reach the school via computers, smartphones, and other electronic devices.”²²⁶ Thus, it is fair to conclude that the Fourth Circuit applied the Doninger foreseeability test rather than creating a new and different “nexus” test.

As it had with Wisniewski, Doninger, Layshock, and Snyder, the Supreme Court denied a petition for a writ of certiorari that had been filed in Kowalski.²²⁷

In a case decided just one month after Kowalski, the Eighth Circuit also relied upon the Second Circuit’s foreseeability test in holding that school officials had authority over a student’s off-campus expression that threatened a school shooting. In D.J.M. v. Hannibal Public School District No. 60,²²⁸ the Eighth Circuit relied on the Second Circuit’s decision in Wisniewski to find that authority over a student’s off-campus speech exists when it is “reasonably foreseeable” that the student’s speech would “come to the attention of school authorities.”²²⁹ In a decision issued one year after the D.J.M. decision, the Eighth Circuit relied on both Doninger and Kowalski as support for its application of a foreseeability test, ²²² J.S. ex rel. H.S. & I.S. v. Bethlehem Area Sch. Dist., 807 A.2d 847, 865 (Pa. 2002).

²²³ Marcus-Toll, supra note 221, at 3431.

²²⁴ Kowalski, 652 F.3d at 574.

²²⁵ Id. (quoting Doninger v. Niehoff, 527 F.3d 41, 48 (2d Cir. 2008))

²²⁶ Id.

²²⁷ Kowalski v. Berkeley Cty. Sch., 565 U.S. 1173 (2012) (mem.).

²²⁸ D.J.M. ex rel. D.M. v. Hannibal Pub. Sch. Dist. # 60, 647 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 2011).

²²⁹ Id. at 765–66 (internal citations omitted).

finding that school officials had authority to discipline students for racist speech posted on the Internet because the speech “could reasonably be expected to reach the school or impact the school environment.”²³⁰

D. The Ninth Circuit Declines to Adopt Any of the Previously Articulated Tests

In 2013, the Ninth Circuit became the fifth federal circuit to address the scope of authority issue in the context of students’ off-campus electronic speech. In Wynar v. Douglas County School District,²³¹ the Ninth Circuit held that school officials had authority to discipline a student who, from his home, had sent “a string of increasingly violent and threatening instant messages . . . bragging about his weapons, threatening to shoot specific classmates, intimating that he would ‘take out’ other people at a school shooting on a specific date, and invoking the image of the Virginia Tech massacre.”²³²

In addressing the scope of authority issue, the Ninth Circuit reviewed all of the earlier decisions of its “sister circuits,”²³³ including the decisions in Kowalski, Lee’s Summit, Wiesniewski, Snyder, and a 2004 decision of the Fifth Circuit involving student off-campus speech that was not communicated electronically.²³⁴ The Ninth Circuit noted that, in Doninger, Kowalski, and Lee’s Summit, the courts had devised “additional threshold test[s]”²³⁵ as prerequisites to the application of Tinker’s substantial disruption standard. In the Ninth Circuit’s view, each case had created different threshold tests.²³⁶ The Ninth Circuit interpreted Kowalski as establishing a “nexus” test²³⁷ and Lee’s Summit as establishing a test requiring it be “reasonably foreseeable that [the speech] [would] reach the school community.”²³⁸ Citing Wiesniewski (not Doninger), the Ninth Circuit asserted that the Second Circuit’s ²³⁰ S.J.W. ex rel. Wilson v. Lee’s Summit R-7 Sch. Dist., 696 F.3d 771 (8th Cir. 2012).

²³¹ Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2013).

²³² Id. at 1064–65.

²³³ Id. at 1067–69.

²³⁴ In Porter, the Fifth Circuit held that school officials had no authority to discipline a student who had drawn a picture depicting violence at school, which came to the attention of school officials two years after its creation, when the student’s younger brother discovered the picture at home and took it to school. Porter v. Ascension Parish Sch. Bd., 393 F.3d 608, 620 (5th Cir. 2004).

²³⁵ Wynar, 728 F.3d at 1068.

²³⁶ Id. at 1068–69.

²³⁷ Id. at 1068.

²³⁸ Id. at 1068 (quoting S.J.W. ex rel. Wilson v. Lee’s Summit R-7 Sch. Dist., 696 F.3d 771, 777 (8th Cir. 2012)).

threshold test was not clear, but that it permitted school discipline where “it is reasonably foreseeable that off-campus speech meeting the Tinker test will wind up at school.”²³⁹ Finally, the Ninth Circuit noted that the Third and Fifth Circuits had “left open the question whether Tinker applies to off-campus speech.”²⁴⁰

In the end, the Ninth Circuit declined to adopt any of the positions of its sister circuits. The court noted the difficulty of articulating “a global standard for a myriad of circumstances involving off-campus speech.”²⁴¹ It also expressed “reluctan[ce] to . . . craft a one-size fits all approach.”²⁴² Rather, the court relied on the content of the student’s speech, stating that “when faced with an identifiable threat of school violence, schools may take disciplinary action in response to off-campus speech” that would cause a substantial disruption.²⁴³ The court then affirmed the trial court’s determination that school officials had not violated the student’s First Amendment rights, noting that “it is an understatement that the specter of a school shooting” could cause a substantial disruption at school.²⁴⁴

Importantly, the Ninth Circuit also analyzed the student’s speech under the “rights of others” prong that the Supreme Court had articulated in Tinker.²⁴⁵ The Ninth Circuit did note that this standard is little used by the federal circuit courts, but also held that it was quite an apt standard to apply to speech that threatened a school shooting.²⁴⁶ The court stated: “Whatever the scope of the ‘rights of other students to be secure and to be let alone,’ without doubt the threat of a school shooting impinges on those rights.”²⁴⁷

²³⁹ Id. at 1068–69. It seems incorrect for the Ninth Circuit to have relied on the opinion in Wisniewski when the later opinion in Doninger expands on the Second Circuit’s view of the scope of authority issue. Doninger v. Niehoff, 527 F.3d 41, 48 (2d Cir. 2008). However, it may be that the Ninth Circuit chose to use Wisniewski because that case, like the one before the Ninth Circuit, involved a threat of violence.

²⁴⁰ Wynar, 728 F.3d at 1069.

²⁴¹ Id.

²⁴² Id.

²⁴³ Id.

²⁴⁴ Id. at 1070. The Ninth Circuit also invoked Tinker’s language referring to the “rights of other students to be secure and let alone.” Id. (quoting Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969)).

²⁴⁵ Id. 1071–72.

²⁴⁶ Id. at 1072.

²⁴⁷ Id. (quoting Tinker, 393 U.S. at 508).

E. The Fifth Circuit Creates a New Test on the Scope of Authority Issue

In 2015, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals became the sixth circuit court to grapple with the scope of authority issue in the context of student off-campus electronic speech. The court's en banc decision in Bell v. Itawamba County School Board, in which sixteen members of the Fifth Circuit authored eight different opinions, epitomizes the deep divisions among the circuit courts on this issue.²⁴⁸

The student's speech in Bell was a rap song recorded outside of school and posted on the Facebook page of Taylor Bell, a student at Itawamba Agricultural High School, who recorded the song under the name "T-Bizzle."²⁴⁹ The rap song, which was riddled with vulgar and obscene language, accused two of the high school's athletic coaches of sexually harassing female students.²⁵⁰ The two coaches were easily identified from the lyrics of the rap song.²⁵¹ In addition to accusing the two coaches of sexual harassment, some lyrics referred to acts of violence against the coaches, as follows:

- "Run up on T-Bizzle/I'm gonna hit you with my rueger";
- "You fucking with the wrong one/going to get a pistol down your mouth"; and
- "Middle fingers up if you want to cap that nigga/middle fingers up/he get no mercy, nigga."²⁵²

The day after Bell posted the rap recording to his Facebook page, one of the coaches learned about the song from his wife, listened to the song while at school, and immediately informed the school's principal.²⁵³ The school district's superintendent also was informed.²⁵⁴ The next school day, the principal and superintendent, along with the school district's outside counsel, questioned Bell about the recording, but took no action.²⁵⁵

²⁴⁸ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc).

²⁴⁹ Id. at 383–84.

²⁵⁰ Id. at 383.

²⁵¹ Id. at 384.

²⁵² Id. The court noted that the word "rueger" referred to a firearm manufactured by Sturm, Ruger & Co., id. at 385, and that the word "cap" . . . is slang for "shoot." Id.

²⁵³ Id.

²⁵⁴ Id.

²⁵⁵ Id.

Due to inclement weather, school was closed for four consecutive school days.²⁵⁶ During that time, Bell created a new version of the recording and uploaded it to YouTube.²⁵⁷ When Bell returned to school following the four-day break, the school informed him at midday that he was suspended pending a disciplinary hearing; however, he was permitted to remain at school for the remainder of the school day so that he could take the school bus home.²⁵⁸

Approximately two weeks later, a disciplinary hearing was held.²⁵⁹ Bell appeared before the disciplinary committee and stated that he had created the rap song to bring awareness to the issue of alleged harassment by the coaches and that he had not intended to make any threats of violence against the school coaches, although he acknowledged that the words of the rap song could be construed as a threat.²⁶⁰ Following the hearing, the disciplinary committee determined that it could not conclusively find that the Bell's song constituted a threat to teachers,²⁶¹ but that his speech had constituted "harassment [or] intimidation of [teachers, in violation of school policy]."²⁶² The disciplinary committee recommended that the school board impose several sanctions, including placement in the county's alternative school for the remainder of the grading period.²⁶³

Bell appealed the committee's decision to the school board, which reviewed the matter and determined that "Bell not only harassed [or] intimidated [school employees], but [that he] also [made threats against] them."²⁶⁴ The school board thus accepted the disciplinary committee's recommendation.²⁶⁵

Immediately thereafter, Bell and his mother filed suit.²⁶⁶ Initially the Bells sought a preliminary injunction to enjoin the implementation of the school board's disciplinary sanctions;²⁶⁷ however, the federal district court denied the motion as moot because Bell's placement at the alternative school had ended.²⁶⁸

²⁵⁶ Id.

²⁵⁷ Id. The recording was publicly accessible on YouTube. Id.

²⁵⁸ Id.

²⁵⁹ Id.

²⁶⁰ Id. at 386.

²⁶¹ Id. The school board's attorney sent a letter to Bell's mother informing her that the disciplinary committee had found "the issue of whether or not lyrics published by Taylor Bell constituted threats to school district teachers was vague." Id.

²⁶² Id.

²⁶³ Id.

²⁶⁴ Id. at 386–87.

²⁶⁵ Id. at 387.

²⁶⁶ Id.

²⁶⁷ Id.

²⁶⁸ Id. at 388.

Later, the federal district granted the school board's motion for summary judgment, finding that Bell's rap song had "in fact caused a material and/or substantial disruption at school" and also that school officials had reasonably forecast that a substantial disruption could take place at school.²⁶⁹

The Bells then appealed to the Fifth Circuit.²⁷⁰ In December 2014, a three-judge panel of the Fifth Circuit reversed the district court, finding that the school board had violated Bell's First Amendment rights by disciplining him for his off-campus speech.²⁷¹ The decision was a two-to-one ruling, with Judge Rhesa Barksdale writing a vigorous dissent.²⁷² In February 2015, the Fifth Circuit granted the school board's petition for a rehearing en banc and vacated the earlier opinion pending additional briefing and oral argument before the en banc panel.²⁷³ Oral argument was heard before the en banc panel on May 12, 2015.²⁷⁴

The en banc panel of the Fifth Circuit issued its opinion in August 2015.²⁷⁵ The court affirmed the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the school board, finding that the board had not violated Bell's First Amendment rights.²⁷⁶ However, the en banc panel of the Fifth Circuit was highly divided. Of the twelve judges in the majority, six judges either authored or joined in separately written concurring opinions.²⁷⁷ Four judges dissented from the decision, and each of the dissenting judges wrote a separate dissenting opinion.²⁷⁸

The majority opinion²⁷⁹ began by reviewing the Supreme Court's four student speech cases, ultimately concluding that the constitutionality of discipline imposed on Bell properly should be analyzed under Tinker rather than any of the other school speech cases.²⁸⁰

²⁶⁹ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 859 F. Supp. 2d 834, 840–42 (N.D. Miss. 2012).

²⁷⁰ Bell, 799 F.3d at 388. Although Bell and his mother had asserted claims in addition to a violation of First Amendment rights, the Bells appealed only the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the school board as to Bell's First Amendment claim. Id.

²⁷¹ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 774 F.3d 280 (5th Cir. 2015).

²⁷² Id. at 305 (Barksdale, J., dissenting).

²⁷³ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 782 F.3d 712 (5th Cir. 2015), aff'd en banc, 799 F.3d 379 (5th Cir. 2015).

²⁷⁴ See Docket Sheet, Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd. 782 F.3d 712 (5th Cir. 2015) (No. 12-60264) (noting that oral argument was held on May 12, 2015).

²⁷⁵ Bell, 799 F.3d at 380.

²⁷⁶ Id. at 383.

²⁷⁷ Id. at 380.

²⁷⁸ Id.

²⁷⁹ The majority opinion was written by Judge Barksdale, who had dissented from the decision in the original panel opinion in the case. Id. at 383; Bell, 774 F.3d at 304 (Barksdale, J., dissenting).

²⁸⁰ Bell, 799 F.3d at 389–91.

On the scope of authority issue, the majority opinion in Bell asserted that five of the six circuit courts to address the issue had determined that “under certain circumstances, Tinker applies to speech which originated, and was disseminated, off-campus.”²⁸¹ In tallying up the circuit courts that had extended Tinker to off-campus speech, the majority in Bell included the Ninth Circuit’s decision in Wynar—notwithstanding the Ninth Circuit’s express reluctance to adopt any of the threshold tests of the other circuits and the Ninth Circuit’s refusal to fashion its own test under which students’ off-campus electronic speech generally would be subject to school authority.²⁸² The majority also included its own circuit as one that favored extending Tinker to off-campus speech even though the Fifth Circuit had not yet addressed the issue.²⁸³ Additionally, two of the three prior Fifth Circuit cases on the issue had found in favor of the students on the ground that school authority did not extend to speech created off campus.²⁸⁴ The only pro-school Fifth Circuit decision cited by the majority was decided in 1973, years before the Supreme Court decided Fraser, Kuhlmeier, or Morse and, of course, before the widespread use of electronic communications.²⁸⁵

Although counting all but the Third Circuit as having concluded that Tinker can apply to off-campus speech,²⁸⁶ the majority opinion did note that the circuit courts had taken “varied approaches”²⁸⁷ to the issue. The majority expressly declined either to “adopt or reject approaches advocated by other circuits”²⁸⁸ or to “adopt any rigid standard”²⁸⁹ with regard ²⁸¹ Id. at 393–94.

²⁸² Id. at 394. For the Ninth Circuit’s refusal to adopt tests fashioned by other courts or to draft its own, generally applicable test, see Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1068–69 (9th Cir. 2013).

²⁸³ Bell, 799 F.3d at 393–94.

²⁸⁴ Porter v. Ascension Parish Sch. Bd., 393 F.3d 608, 620 (5th Cir. 2004); Shanley v. Ne. Indep. Sch. Dist., 462 F.2d 960 (5th Cir. 1972). In Shanley, the Fifth Circuit held that school officials did not have authority to discipline students for the distribution of a newspaper created outside of school and distributed “near but outside the school premises.” Id. at 964. The Fifth Circuit did apply Tinker in determining that the distribution of the newspaper had not caused a substantial disruption at school; however, the court also emphasized the out-of-school nature of the students’ conduct. Id. at 964, 970.

²⁸⁵ See Bell, 799 F.3d at 394 (citing Sullivan v. Hous. Indep. Sch. Dist., 475 F.2d 1071 (5th Cir. 1973) (holding that the First Amendment did not protect the conduct of students who stood just outside an entrance to school campus selling an underground newspaper to other students who were entering campus)); see also Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393 (2007); Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. Kuhlmeier, 484 U.S. 260 (1988); Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675 (1986).

²⁸⁶ Bell, 799 F.3d at 393–94.

²⁸⁷ Id. at 395.

²⁸⁸ Id. at 396.

²⁸⁹ Id.

to the scope of authority issue; rather, it fashioned a test entirely limited to the facts before it. The majority held that Tinker applies to a student's off-campus speech when (a) "a student intentionally directs [speech] at the school community," and (b) the speech is "reasonably understood by school officials to threaten, harass, and intimidate a teacher."²⁹⁰

Those two circumstances only addressed the preliminary question whether school officials had the authority to examine the student's speech under the Tinker substantial disruption standard.²⁹¹ Thus, in order to answer the penultimate question whether the conduct of officials had violated Bell's First Amendment rights, the majority considered whether his speech either had caused a substantial disruption or could have been reasonably forecast to cause a substantial disruption.²⁹² On that question, the majority concluded that school officials could have reasonably foreseen that Bell's rap song would cause a future substantial disruption had he not been disciplined.²⁹³

As noted above, there were multiple concurring and dissenting opinions written in Bell. Several judges who concurred in the decision wrote concurring opinions in an apparent effort to limit the scope of the majority decision.²⁹⁴ For example, Judge E. Grady Jolly wrote a separate concurring opinion in which he stated that he would have decided the case "in the simplest way . . . by saying as little as possible."²⁹⁵ Judge Jolly would have adopted a more limited rule focused solely on threats of violence, as follows:

Student speech is unprotected by the First Amendment and is subject to school discipline when that speech contains an actual threat to kill or physically harm personnel and/or students of the school; which actual threat is connected to the school environment; and which actual threat is communicated to the school, or its students, or its personnel.²⁹⁶

Thus, Judge Jolly would not have addressed off-campus student speech that could be construed as harassing or intimidating a teacher.

²⁹⁰ Id. In a decision issued in 2016, the Fifth Circuit, quoting Bell, stated that the decision whether to apply Tinker in any particular case is "heavily influenced by the facts in each matter." Brindson v. McAllen Ind. Sch. Dist., 832 F.3d 519, 533 n.7 (5th Cir. 2016).

²⁹¹ Bell, 799 F.3d at 396.

²⁹² Id. at 397.

²⁹³ Id. at 398–400.

²⁹⁴ Id. at 400 (Jolly, J., concurring); id. at 401 (Walker Elrod, J., concurring).

²⁹⁵ Id. at 401 (Jolly, J., concurring).

²⁹⁶ Id.

Judge Jennifer Walker Elrod wrote a concurring opinion that also focused only on threats of physical violence.²⁹⁷ She opined that the majority opinion did not make Tinker applicable to off-campus student speech of a nonthreatening nature “even though some school administrators might consider such speech offensive, harassing or disruptive.”²⁹⁸ Casting the majority opinion in Bell as one that avoided such ominous implications by “sensibly” limiting the scope of school authority to student speech that “contained threats of physical violence,” Judge Walker concurred in the result.²⁹⁹

Finally, Judge Gregg Costa wrote a concurring opinion, joined by two other members of the panel,³⁰⁰ in which he emphasized the need for guidance from the Supreme Court on the scope of authority issue, stating:

Broader questions raised by off-campus speech will be left for another day. That day is coming soon, however, and this court or the higher one will need to provide clear guidance for students, teachers, and school administrators that balances students’ First Amendment rights that Tinker rightly recognized with the vital need to foster a school environment conducive to learning. That task will not be easy in light of the pervasive use of social media among students and the disruptive effect on learning that such speech can have when it is directed at fellow students and educators.³⁰¹

Four judges of the en banc panel dissented from the decision in Bell, and each judge wrote a separate dissenting opinion.³⁰² Judge James L. Dennis, who had written the majority opinion in the original panel decision that had been vacated pending en banc review,³⁰³ wrote a scathing dissent in which he accused the majority of committing “several serious and unfortunate constitutional errors.”³⁰⁴ In sharp words, he accused the majority of gutting students’ First Amendment rights:

[T]he majority opinion obliterates the historically significant distinction between the household and the schoolyard by permitting a school policy to supplant parental authority over the propriety of a child’s expressive activities on the Internet outside of school, ²⁹⁷ Id. at 401 (Walker Elrod, J., concurring).

²⁹⁸ Id. at 402.

²⁹⁹ Id.

³⁰⁰ Id. (Costa, J., concurring).

³⁰¹ Id. at 403.

³⁰² Id. (Dennis, J. dissenting); id. at 433 (Prado, J., dissenting); id. at 435 (Haynes, J., dissenting); id. (Graves, J., dissenting).

³⁰³ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 774 F.3d 280 (5th Cir. 2015).

³⁰⁴ Bell, 799 F.3d at 406.

expanding schools' censorial authority from the campus and the teacher's classroom to the home and the child's bedroom.³⁰⁵

In sharp contrast to the approach taken by the majority, Judge Dennis's analysis of the issue began not with the question whether Bell's speech was "student" speech or not, but whether his speech was entitled to First Amendment protection generally.³⁰⁶ In other words, Judge Dennis first treated Bell as a citizen, not a student.³⁰⁷ Characterizing Bell's rap song as speech on an issue of public concern, specifically alleging sexual harassment of female students, Judge Dennis opined that Bell's speech was speech that "occupie[d] the highest rung of hierarchy of First Amendment values and [thus] . . . entitled to special protection."³⁰⁸ Citing Supreme Court precedent,³⁰⁹ Judge Dennis opined that the vulgar and violent words used in the song did not alter the conclusion that the song addressed a matter of public concern, even if Bell's words "[f]ell short of the School Board's aesthetic preferences for socio-political commentary."³¹⁰

Judge Dennis next criticized the majority's two-part test for determining whether Bell's rap song was student speech subject to the disciplinary power of school authorities. As to the first part of the test, the requirement that a student must have "intentionally directed"³¹¹ speech at the school community, Judge Dennis noted that such a requirement would eviscerate the First Amendment by punishing the speaker for attempting to communicate his message to others.³¹² In other words, a student could avoid satisfying this requirement of "intentional

³⁰⁵ Id. at 404.

³⁰⁶ Id. at 406–12.

³⁰⁷ Indeed, Judge Dennis criticized the majority for "simply assuming that all children speak 'qua students,'" id. at 415 (Dennis, J., dissenting) (quoting id. at 389–90 (majority opinion)), and for otherwise assuming that "minors' constitutional rights outside of school are somehow qualified if they coincidentally are enrolled in a public school" id.

³⁰⁸ Id. at 406 (quoting Snyder v. Phelps, 562 U.S. 443, 452 (2011)).

³⁰⁹ Judge Dennis reviewed at length the Supreme Court's decision in Snyder v. Phelps, in which the Court found that the First Amendment prohibited the imposition of tort liability against the Westboro Baptist Church, a fringe group that had picketed the funerals of American soldiers killed in the line of duty. Id. at 407–09; see Snyder v. Phelps, 562 U.S. 443, 448 (2011). At such funerals, picketers had displayed signs that read, among other things, "Thank God for Dead Soldiers," "Thank God for IEDs," and "God Hates the USA/Thank God for 9/11." Snyder, 562 U.S. at 448. The Court held that such speech was protected under the First Amendment because the picketers had been commenting on matters of public concern. Id. at 450–51, 460–61. Such speech is protected by the First Amendment even if it is "upsetting," "arouses contempt," or expresses an idea that society finds to be "offensive or disagreeable." Id. at 458.

³¹⁰ Bell, 799 F.3d at 409 (Dennis, J., dissenting).

³¹¹ Id. at 412.

³¹² Id. at 411.

direction” only if the student communicated so privately that his message would not be seen by many in the school community.

As to the second part of the majority’s test—that the speech would be reasonably understood to constitute threatening, harassing, or intimidating language toward a teacher—Judge Dennis decried the use of “content-based” and “vague” language as a means to determine First Amendment protection.³¹³ He concluded that the “majority opinion’s failure to . . . defin[e] ‘threatening,’ ‘harassing,’ or ‘intimidating’” language made its articulated test constitutionally unworkable.³¹⁴ Judge Dennis also opined that this vague language would impermissibly define First Amendment protection according to the potential reactions of listeners.³¹⁵ He categorically rejected any test of free speech that would rely on the listener’s idiosyncratic interpretation of the speech as harassing or intimidating.³¹⁶ Judge Dennis expressed concern that the constitutional infirmities of such vague language were further “exacerbated by the facts that the Tinker [substantial disruption] standard itself could be viewed as somewhat vague.”³¹⁷ In Judge Dennis’s view, these “various layers of vagueness” would impermissibly restrict students’ First Amendment protections.³¹⁸

Judge Dennis made no attempt to fashion an alternative test to govern the scope of authority over students’ off-campus speech. Rather, he simply criticized the majority’s decision to apply Tinker to the off-campus speech at issue in the case, finding that the Tinker standard applied only to “speech that actually occurs within the school environment.”³¹⁹ He also criticized the extension of school authority to student off-campus speech as an unwarranted intrusion into parents’ rights to control the upbringing of their children.³²⁰ Finally, Judge Dennis concluded that, even if school officials had the authority to discipline Bell for his off-campus speech, they had violated his First Amendment rights because the facts did not ³¹³ Id. at 413–16.

³¹⁴ Id. at 416.

³¹⁵ Id. at 419–22.

³¹⁶ Id. at 421.

³¹⁷ Id. at 418.

³¹⁸ Id. at 419.

³¹⁹ Id. at 425.

³²⁰ Id. at 426 (“[I]t is a dangerous fiction to pretend that parents simply delegate their authority—including their authority to determine what their children may say and hear—to public school authorities” (quoting Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 424 (2007) (Alito, J., concurring))).

demonstrate either an actual substantial disruption at school or a reasonable forecast of a substantial disruption.³²¹

Judge Edward C. Prado also wrote a dissenting opinion in Bell.³²² Judge Prado briefly reviewed some of the other circuit court decisions addressing student off-campus electronic speech before concluding that the majority opinion had “appear[ed] to depart from the other, already divided circuits in yet another direction.”³²³ He then expressed “hope that the Supreme Court will soon give courts the necessary guidance to resolve these difficult cases.”³²⁴ Noting that Bell’s speech did not fit into “currently established, narrow categories of unprotected speech”³²⁵ previously articulated by the Supreme Court, Judge Prado opined that the court should have “wait[ed] for the Supreme Court to act before exempting a new category of speech from First Amendment protection.”³²⁶

Finally, Judge James E. Graves authored a dissenting opinion in which he proposed that a “modified Tinker standard”³²⁷ be used in cases involving student off-campus speech.³²⁸ Judge Graves’s test cobbled together various pieces of the decisions of other circuits, principally the Doninger and Kowalski cases.³²⁹ The test proposed by Judge Graves would allow school officials to discipline a student for off-campus speech if the school could (a) satisfy Tinker’s substantial disruption standard (either an actual or reasonably forecasted disruption) and (b) “demonstrate a sufficient nexus between the speech and the school’s pedagogical interests that would justify the school’s discipline of the student.”³³⁰ Three nonexclusive factors could demonstrate a sufficient nexus. Those factors were (a) “whether the speech could reasonably be expected to reach the ³²¹ Id. at 427–31.

³²² Id. at 433–35 (Prado, J., dissenting).

³²³ Id. at 433–34.

³²⁴ Id. at 433.

³²⁵ Id. at 434. He also stated that the issue of students’ off-campus electronic speech was a “poor fit” within current First Amendment jurisprudence. Id. at 433.

³²⁶ Id. at 434. Judge Prado did note that the Fifth Circuit previously had held that student speech threatening violence on the scale of “mass, systematic school-shootings in the style that has become painfully familiar in the United States” is not protected by the First Amendment. Id. (emphasis added) (quoting Ponce v. Socorro Indep. Sch. Dist., 508 F.3d 765, 770–71 (5th Cir. 2007)).

³²⁷ Id. at 435.

³²⁸ In addition to the dissenting opinions of Judges Dennis, Prado, and Graves, Judge Catharina Haynes wrote a brief dissenting opinion in which she stated that she would have reversed the district court’s grant of summary judgment and remanded the case for reasons stated in the majority opinion of the three-judge panel that had originally decided the case. Id. (Haynes, J., dissenting) (citing Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 774 F.3d 280, 290–303 (5th Cir. 2015)).

³²⁹ Id. at 436 & nn.2–6.

³³⁰ Id. at 436.

school environment”;³³¹ (b) “whether the school’s interest as trustee of student well-being”³³² outweighs parents’ traditional role in disciplining their children for conduct outside of school;³³³ and (c) “whether the predominant message of the student’s speech is entitled to heightened protection.”³³⁴

Thus, the en banc panel of the Fifth Circuit struggled mightily to reach a decision in the Bell case. In addition to the test articulated in the majority opinion, both concurring and dissenting judges sought to fashion other rules.³³⁵ Among both the concurring and the dissenting judges were requests that the Supreme Court provided necessary guidance on the “the difficult issues of off-campus online speech.”³³⁶

On November 17, 2015, Bell filed a petition for a writ of certiorari with the Supreme Court.³³⁷ On February 29, 2016, the Supreme Court denied the petition.³³⁸ Thus, the lower federal courts were left without the Supreme Court’s “clear guidance”³³⁹ on the constitutionality of school discipline resulting from students’ off-campus electronic speech.

III. EXISTING PRECEDENTS PROVIDE THE FRAMEWORK TO ADDRESS STUDENTS’ FIRST AMENDMENT RIGHTS IN THE DIGITAL AGE

The splintered and disparate approaches taken by the federal circuit courts have resulted in scores of different opinions among scholars and educators about the proper framework to be applied to student off-campus electronic speech. Most commentators agree that students have the free speech rights of an ordinary citizen when not at school.³⁴⁰ Also ³³¹ Id. at 436 & n.3 (citing Wisniewski v. Bd. of Educ. of Weedsport Cent. Sch. Dist., 494 F.3d 34, 38–39 (2d Cir. 2007); Doninger v. Niehoff, 527 F.3d 41, 50 (2d Cir. 2008); D.J.M. ex rel. D.M. v. Hannibal Pub. Sch. Dist., 647 F.3d 754, 766 (8th Cir. 2011)).

³³² Bell, 799 F.3d at 436 & n.4.

³³³ As to this second factor, Judge Graves proposed that a court should give “particular weight to evidence, experiential or otherwise,” that would demonstrate that a type or category of student off-campus speech had “a unique and proven adverse impact on students and the campus environment.” Id. (emphases omitted). He specifically referenced the research on bullying that had been cited by the Fourth Circuit in Kowalski as an example of such evidence. Id. at 436 & n.6.

³³⁴ Id.

³³⁵ Id. at 403 (Jolly, J., concurring); id. at 435 (Graves, J., dissenting).

³³⁶ Id. at 435 (Prado, J., dissenting).

³³⁷ Petition for a Writ of Certiorari, Bell, 799 F.3d 379 (No. 15-666), 2015 WL 7299351.

³³⁸ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 136 S. Ct. 1166 (2016).

³³⁹ Bell, 799 F.3d at 403 (Jolly, J., concurring).

³⁴⁰ See Richard Salgado, Protecting Student Speech Rights While Increasing School Safety: School Jurisdiction and the Search for Warning Signs in a Post-Columbine/Red Lake Environment, 2005 B.Y.U. L. REV. 1371, 1373 (2005) (noting that a point of general agreement is that students have the right to a safe and secure learning environment uninterrupted by the speech of other students.³⁴¹ How to accomplish those twin goals, however, is a subject of much debate.

Although the scope of students' First Amendment rights regarding off-campus electronic speech is a thorny one, the Supreme Court's existing precedents, when considered together, largely provide the appropriate framework to balance students' constitutional rights against the authority of school officials to maintain an orderly and effective learning environment at school. In particular—with the one exception of speech that threatens violence—the Tinker standard largely provides the appropriate framework to address students' free speech rights in the digital age.³⁴² The following discussion thus demonstrates how Tinker can be applied to different categories or types of student electronic speech.

A. The Court Should Create a New Category of Unprotected Student Speech: Speech That Threatens Death or Serious Bodily Harm to a Member of the School Community

Clearly the on-campus/off-campus distinction should not protect student speech that threatens serious physical harm to any member of the school community, whether the threat is akin to a Columbine-type shooting³⁴³ or a specific threat made against a particular individual.³⁴⁴ Students and school employees alike should be protected from threats of death or serious bodily harm. Thus, the First Amendment should not considerations of safety and security are important but “school administrators do not necessarily trample upon students’ First Amendment rights”); Black, supra note 198, at 557 (noting that school administrators need guidance to balance students’ First Amendment rights against the need for safety); Jon G. Crawford, When Student Off-Campus Cyberspeech Permeates the Schoolhouse Gate: Are There Limits to Tinker’s Reach?, 45 URB. LAW. 235, 249 (2013) (discussing the need to balance rights to feel safe and secure against the right of free speech).

³⁴¹ See supra note 340.

³⁴² There are scholars who have advocated that Tinker be abandoned completely. See, e.g., R. George Wright, Post-Tinker, 10 STAN. J. CIV. RTS. & CIV. LIBERTIES 1 (2014). Others have advocated that a different standard be created specifically for students’ “technology-facilitated expression.” Kathleen Conn, The Third Circuit En Banc Decisions on Out-of-School Student Speech: Analysis and Recommendations, 270 EDUC. L. REP. 389, 406 (2011).

³⁴³ Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1064 (9th Cir. 2013).

³⁴⁴ Wisniewski v. Bd. of Educ. of Weedsport Cent. Sch. Dist., 494 F.3d 34 (2d Cir. 2007); J.S. ex rel. H.S. v. Bethlehem Area Sch. Dist., 807 A.2d 847, 851–52 (Pa. 2002) (The student’s off-campus speech included a drawing of a teacher “with her head cut off and blood dripping from her neck,” accompanied by a list of reasons why she should die.).

protect any student's off-campus electronic speech that a school official reasonably believes is a credible threat of death or serious bodily harm against either the school community in general or any member of the school community.

To date, the courts essentially have recognized and upheld this principle, although the legal analyses they have employed to reach this conclusion have varied.³⁴⁵ For example, in Wisniewski, the Second Circuit applied a threshold test premised on some "reasonable foreseeability" that speech would reach school in a case in which a student's off-campus speech threatened a teacher.³⁴⁶ In Wynar, the Ninth Circuit did not employ a threshold test, but determined that a student's off-campus threats of a school shooting were not protected under Tinker's substantial disruption standard.³⁴⁷ In Bell, the Fifth Circuit determined that Tinker would apply to student off-campus speech of a threatening nature if the student "intentionally directed" the speech at the school community.³⁴⁸ Thus, while these cases may have reached the correct conclusion,³⁴⁹ the courts' varying approaches do not provide clear guidance for school officials to guide their decision making when considering whether to discipline students for off-campus speech.

The most suitable approach is to simply create an additional category of unprotected student speech. Since the Court decided Tinker in 1969, it has not hesitated to create additional categories of unprotected student speech. In at least two cases, the Court approved content-based restrictions on student speech. In Fraser, the Court ruled that lewd, indecent, and offensive speech was not protected when uttered at school.³⁵⁰ In Morse, the Court ruled that student speech that promotes illegal drug use was not protected.³⁵¹ Importantly, in deciding Morse, the Court took pains to clarify that, in Fraser, it had not applied Tinker but had created a separate category of unprotected student speech.³⁵² Thus, the Court in Morse

³⁴⁵ See Emily Gold Waldman, Badmouthing Authority: Hostile Speech About School Officials and the Limits of School Restrictions, 19 WM. & MARY BILL RTS. J. 591, 599–603, 620–23 (2011) (discussing the courts' varied rationales for imposing discipline on student speech that threatens school employees, whether the speech originated on campus or off campus).

³⁴⁶ Wisniewski, 494 F.3d at 39.

³⁴⁷ Wynar, 728 F.3d at 1069–70.

³⁴⁸ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 396 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc).

³⁴⁹ It is not clear that, on the question of the violent nature of the student's speech, the correct decision was reached in Bell. See supra notes 308–310.

³⁵⁰ Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 685 (1986).

³⁵¹ Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 408–10 (2007).

³⁵² See supra Section I.D.

approved of content-based restrictions on student speech if necessary to maintain order at school.

While these two content-based categories were limited to the school environment, the rationale for creating these categories was broadly grounded in the “special danger[s]”³⁵³ that can exist at school and the “special characteristics of the school environment.”³⁵⁴ Obviously a credible threat of death or serious bodily harm to members of the school community is one of those special dangers.³⁵⁵ Students at school are a “captive audience”³⁵⁶ since their attendance at school is mandatory.³⁵⁷ As our nation’s recent experiences make plain, students sometimes are captive victims of the deadly intentions of others.³⁵⁸ In light of that grim reality, school officials must be able to act whenever faced with a credible threat of serious bodily harm to any member of the school community.

Thus, the Court should create a new category of unprotected student speech. Student violent speech should not simply be folded into Tinker’s substantial disruption standard, as was done in Wynar.³⁵⁹ There are two advantages of delinking the threats of violence from the substantial disruption standard. One is that it simply avoids the somewhat tortured linguistics of labeling a school shooting as “disrupti[ve].” School shootings are horrific events, not merely “disruptive.”³⁶⁰ Second, removing credible threats of violence from the definition of a “substantial disruption” also will allow the Court to separately describe the scope of a substantial disruption, thus giving valuable guidance to school officials as to that separate category of regulation over student speech.

Thus, the Court should find that student speech that school officials reasonably believe is a credible threat of death ³⁵³ Morse, 551 U.S. at 424 (Alito, J., concurring).

³⁵⁴ Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 506 (1969).

³⁵⁵ See, e.g., Gold Waldman, supra note 345, at 603 (detailing the psychological effects experienced by school employees who were the targets of students’ violent speech).

³⁵⁶ Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 684 (1986).

³⁵⁷ Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 424 (2007) (Alito, J., concurring) (“School attendance can expose students to threats to their physical safety that they would not otherwise face.”).

³⁵⁸ 142 School Shootings Since Sandy Hook Massacre in Newtown, Conn., WASH. TIMES (Oct. 1, 2015), <http://www.washingtontimes.com/news/2015/oct/1/142-school-shootings-sandy-hook-massacre-newtown-c/> [<https://perma.cc/TKW7-RQ6V>] Other information about school-associated violent deaths can be found at School-Associated Violent Death Study, CTR. FOR DISEASE CONTROL & PREVENTION, <http://www.cdc.gov/violence-prevention/youthviolence/schoolviolence/savd.html> [<https://perma.cc/5DK7-TDVV>] (last updated May 11, 2016).

³⁵⁹ Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1069 (9th Cir. 2013).

³⁶⁰ Id. at 1070 (“It is an understatement that the specter of a school shooting qualifies . . . under Tinker.”).

or serious bodily harm to any member of the school community is not protected under the First Amendment.³⁶¹ Such student speech is subject to discipline regardless of where it was created, the means by which it was communicated to school officials, or the location where the threat may be carried out. While school officials should (and likely would) involve law enforcement when a student's electronic speech indicates that violence may occur outside of school, school discipline still is the appropriate response—over and above any law enforcement proceedings—when a student threatens violence against any member of the school community.

If the Court were to create such a category of unprotected student speech, the Court should also clarify the contours of such a rule. In particular, the Court should find that the inquiry is not whether the student subjectively intended to threaten someone, but whether a reasonable school official could objectively interpret the language as a threat.³⁶²

On that issue, the Court must distinguish the student speech context from its recent decision in *Elonis v. United States*³⁶³ and the federal cases that have reached differing conclusions regarding the intent requirement in the context of a “true threat” analysis.³⁶⁴ In Elonis, the Court addressed the issue whether criminal penalties could be imposed on an individual who published threatening statements on the Internet without proof that the defendant subjectively intended ³⁶¹ This is a different rule than that proposed by Judge Jolly in his concurring opinion in Bell. See supra Section II.E. Judge Jolly proposed a three-element rule that required (a) “an actual threat to kill or physically harm” school staff or students; (b) which is “connected to the school environment”; and (c) “is communicated to the school,” including students or school staff. Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 401 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc). Judge Jolly's rule contains limits that are not ideal. So, for example, if a student's threatening speech was communicated to someone who was not another student or school personnel, the third element would not be satisfied.

³⁶² See J.S. ex rel. H.S. v. Bethlehem Area Sch. Dist., 807 A.2d 847, 857–58 (Pa. 2002). In J.S., the student's off-campus speech included a picture of the teacher with her head cut off and blood dripping from her neck. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court held that the student's speech constituted a “true threat” that was not entitled to First Amendment protection. Id. In so holding, the court applied “an objective reasonable person standard.” Id. (citing In the Interest of A.S., 626 N.W.2d 712 (Wis. 2001)). However, some scholars take the position that school officials must determine the student's subjective intent as part of a true threat analysis. See, e.g., Mary Margaret Roark, Elonis v. United States: The Doctrine of True Threats: Protecting Our Ever-Shrinking First Amendment Rights in the New Era of Communication, 15 U. PITT. J. TECH. L. & POL'Y. 197, 217 (2015).

³⁶³ Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001 (2015).

³⁶⁴ See John Villasenor, Technology and the Role of Intent in Constitutionally Protected Expression, 39 HARV. J.L. & PUB. POL'Y 631, 652–56 (2016) (discussing the “subjective-versus-objective question” that has divided the federal courts in analyzing true threats).

to make a threat.³⁶⁵ The defendant in Elonis, an adult male, had written several posts on Facebook expressing a desire to harm others, including one post in which he stated, “I’m checking out and making a name for myself/Enough elementary schools in a ten mile radius to initiate the most heinous school shooting ever imagined.”³⁶⁶ After being convicted of violating federal law that criminalized communication transmitted in interstate commerce that contained “any threat to injure the person of another,”³⁶⁷ the defendant appealed his conviction on the ground that the government was required to prove that he subjectively intended his postings to be threats.³⁶⁸

The Court reversed the defendant’s conviction, finding that the trial court had erred in instructing the jury that it need consider only whether a reasonable person would regard the defendant’s postings as threats.³⁶⁹ The Court determined that the reasonable person standard should not be applied to a criminal statute, reasoning that the imposition of criminal sanctions requires some proof that the defendant was aware of his wrongdoing.³⁷⁰

By deciding the case on the more narrow issue of whether the particular criminal statute required proof of a subjective intent to threaten, the Court avoided the constitutional question of the intent requirement needed to establish that speech constituted a true threat.³⁷¹ Justice Thomas authored a dissenting opinion in which he did consider the First Amendment question.³⁷² To demonstrate the need for an objective reasonable person standard, Justice Thomas invoked the circumstance of a school shooting, stating:

[T]here is nothing absurd about punishing an individual who, with knowledge of the words he uses and their ordinary meaning in context, makes a threat. For instance, a high-school student who sends a letter to his principal stating that he will massacre his classmates with a machine gun, even if he intended the letter as a joke, cannot fairly be described as engaging in innocent conduct.³⁷³

³⁶⁵ Elonis, 135 S. Ct. at 2004.

³⁶⁶ Id. at 2006.

³⁶⁷ See id. at 2007; United States v. Elonis, 897 F. Supp. 2d 335 (E.D. Pa. 2012) (noting defendant’s conviction and denying post-trial motions); see also 18 U.S.C. § 875(c) (2012).

³⁶⁸ Elonis, 135 S. Ct. at 2007.

³⁶⁹ Id. at 2012.

³⁷⁰ Id.

³⁷¹ See Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 420–21 (5th Cir. 2015) (Dennis, J., dissenting) (discussing Elonis).

³⁷² Elonis, 135 S. Ct. at 2018 (Thomas, J., dissenting).

³⁷³ Id.

Indeed, threats to cause harm in the school environment do require a different analysis. Even if the Court correctly applied the subjective intent standard in Elonis, a case involving a criminal statute, the school setting is entirely different. Given the special characteristics of the school environment and the potentially devastating results of violence in the school setting, school administrators should be able to act on a lesser standard, namely whether a school administrator reasonably believes that the student's electronic transmission contains a credible threat of violence. The ability to impose discipline without a constitutional challenge would be severely curtailed if students who made such threats had a ready defense, specifically that they intended only to make a joke.³⁷⁴ Simply put, application of a subjective standard might make school administrators more reluctant to act. On the other hand, if the school imposes discipline based on an objective standard, then the student could not later succeed on a First Amendment claim by saying, "I was just kidding." In light of the potential risks, the objective standard, namely whether an objective school administrator would have reasonably determined that the electronic transmission contained a threat of violence, should be applied.

In addition, unlike Elonis, any discipline meted out by school officials does not criminalize behavior or impose criminal penalties. Thus, the use of a reasonable person standard in terms of school discipline results in far fewer consequences than it does in the criminal context.

School officials have the enormous responsibility to ensure that all students at school are safe and "secure."³⁷⁵ In order to fulfill their responsibilities to all students who are compelled to attend school, the proper standard in the school context is whether school officials reasonably interpret the speech as a credible threat of death or serious bodily harm.

The Court also could provide guidance as to what constitutes a credible threat to cause death or serious bodily harm. The student's speech at issue in Wynar provides a good example of a credible threat. There, the student frequently posted messages on social media that, over a period of months, grew ever more violent.³⁷⁶ He specifically threatened to conduct a school shooting on April 20, the anniversary of the Columbine ³⁷⁴ See Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1066 (9th Cir. 2013).

³⁷⁵ Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969) (Students have a right "to be secure and to be let alone.")

³⁷⁶ Wynar, 728 F.3d at 1065.

shooting.³⁷⁷ He described the type of gun and ammunition that he would use, noting that he would “probly only kill the people I hate?/who hate me/then a few random to get the record?”³⁷⁸ The student’s speech alarmed the other students with whom he had shared his posts to such an extent that they contacted a school employee.³⁷⁹ After viewing the student’s online postings, the police were called and the student was taken into custody.³⁸⁰

In contrast, a recent federal district court case provides an example of speech that would not be viewed as a credible threat. In Burge v. Colton School District, a middle school student, who was disciplined for off-campus statements he had posted on social media, filed suit alleging a violation of his First Amendment rights.³⁸¹ The student’s speech included statements that he wanted to “start a petition to get [his teacher] fired,”³⁸² that she was “the worst teacher ever,”³⁸³ and that she was “just a bitch.”³⁸⁴ After a friend responded “XD HAHAAAAHA!!,”³⁸⁵ the student wrote “Ya haha she just needs to be shot.”³⁸⁶

Although the student deleted the post within twenty-four hours after posting it, another student had printed out a copy of the post and, many weeks later, gave the printout to the school principal.³⁸⁷ The principal then determined to suspend the student from school and thereafter the student filed suit.³⁸⁸ The federal district court granted the student’s motion for summary judgment, finding that the school district had violated the student’s First Amendment rights.³⁸⁹

The court determined that the student’s speech could not be construed as a true threat to school safety under either a subjective or an objective standard.³⁹⁰ In so holding, the court noted that, after reading the printout, school officials did not question the student or his parents about access to guns, seek ³⁷⁷ Id.

³⁷⁸ Id.

³⁷⁹ Id. at 1066.

³⁸⁰ Id.

³⁸¹ Burge ex rel. Burge v. Colton Sch. Dist., 100 F. Supp. 3d 1057 (D. Or. 2015).

³⁸² Id. at 1060.

³⁸³ Id.

³⁸⁴ Id.

³⁸⁵ Id. “XD” is a laughing emoticon. XD, SLANGIT, <http://slangit.com/meaning/xd> [<https://perma.cc/93S7-5HJG>] (last updated Dec. 1, 2016).

³⁸⁶ Burge, 100 F. Supp. 3d at 1060.

³⁸⁷ Id.

³⁸⁸ Id.

³⁸⁹ Id. The district judge adopted the report and recommendation of a magistrate judge, who recommended that summary judgment be granted to the student on his First Amendment claim and that summary judgment be granted to the school district on a due process claim. Id.

³⁹⁰ Id. at 1068–70.

the involvement of law enforcement, or consider any mental health evaluation or intervention.³⁹¹ School officials also did not remove the student from the teacher's classroom.³⁹² Rather, the student simply was given a three-and-a-half day in-school suspension, which he served by sitting in an office at school.³⁹³ Thus, the court determined that the conduct of school officials showed a lack of any reasonable belief that the speech constituted a credible threat.³⁹⁴

Given the serious issue of student threats of violence, it truly is unfortunate that the Supreme Court did not grant certiorari in Bell. First, the Court could have articulated a clear category of unprotected student off-campus speech. In addition, the Court could have outlined the contours of that category. Arguably the Fifth Circuit erred in concluding that Bell's rap song was a threat.³⁹⁵ The majority in Bell determined that school personnel had been threatened even though, under the measures outlined in Burge, no credible threat of violence had been made. In Bell, school officials did not contact law enforcement.³⁹⁶ On the first day that they discussed the rap song with Bell, the school principal drove him home.³⁹⁷ On the day that school officials suspended Bell, they allowed him to remain unattended in the school commons for the rest of day so that he could ride the bus home.³⁹⁸ In addition, the disciplinary committee determined that any threat contained in the rap song was "vague."³⁹⁹ These important facts from the case indicate that school officials did not interpret the rap song to be a credible threat of violence.

Had the Supreme Court granted certiorari in Bell, the Court could have set constitutional guidelines for this important category of student speech. In this regard, the Court's decision to deny certiorari in Bell was a missed opportunity to clarify students' First Amendment rights in the digital age.

³⁹¹ Id. at 1069.

³⁹² Id.

³⁹³ Id. at 1064.

³⁹⁴ Id.; see also J.S. ex rel. H.S. v. Bethlehem Area Sch. Dist., 807 A.2d 847, 858 (Pa. 2002) (listing relevant factors in determining whether a statement is a credible threat, including how the recipient or other listeners reacted to the threat, whether the threat was conditional, and whether the speaker had made similar statements in the past).

³⁹⁵ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 429 (5th Cir. 2015) (Dennis, J., dissenting).

³⁹⁶ Id.

³⁹⁷ Id.

³⁹⁸ Id.

³⁹⁹ Id. at 386.

B. Tinker's "Rights of Others" Prong Should Apply to Student-on-Student Off-Campus Speech That Constitutes Bullying or Harassment

The lower federal courts also need guidance as to the proper scope of authority over student off-campus speech that constitutes bullying or harassment. This is an issue that is of particular importance in the digital age, since bullying using electronic means, also known as cyberbullying, can be particularly vicious and harmful.⁴⁰⁰ As to this form of student off-campus electronic speech, many scholars have advocated that the Supreme Court extend school authority under Tinker's "rights of others" prong.⁴⁰¹ Indeed, bullying or harassing speech seems to fit squarely within the rule expressed in Tinker that one student's speech should not interfere with the "rights of other students to be secure and to be let alone."⁴⁰² Due to the serious adverse consequences associated with student-on-student bullying and harassment, no First Amendment protection should be afforded to such speech, and school officials ought to have the authority to discipline students for such speech regardless of whether the speech was created outside of the school environment. I therefore join other scholars who advocate that Tinker's rights of others prong be applied to student-on-student bullying or harassing speech.

Tinker obviously was decided in an age where students did not harass or bully each other electronically; however, Tinker's rationale, namely that all students have to the right to be "let alone"⁴⁰³ at school, applies to off-campus bullying or harassing speech because the effects of such speech are felt by ⁴⁰⁰ Kowalski v. Berkeley Cty. Schs., 652 F.3d 565, 572 (4th Cir. 2011) (detailing the harmful effects of student-on-student bullying). Due to a variety of factors, particularly the distance between bully and victim that electronic communications provide, cyberbullying can be particularly vicious and harmful. See Kevin Turbert, Note, Faceless Bullies: Legislative and Judicial Responses to Cyberbullying, 33 SETON HALL LEGIS. J. 651, 653–54 (2009) (detailing the harmful effects of cyberbullying, particularly on adolescents); Gold Waldman, supra note 345, at 647–49 (detailing research on cyber speech).

⁴⁰¹ See, e.g., Martha McCarthy, Student Expression That Collides with the Rights of Others: Should the Second Prong of Tinker Stand Alone?, 240 EDUC. L. REP. 1, 10 (2009) [hereinafter McCarthy, Student Expression]; Martha McCarthy, Cyberbullying Law and First Amendment Rulings: Can They Be Reconciled?, 83 MISS. L.J. 805, 828 (2014) [hereinafter McCarthy, Cyberbullying]; Black, supra note 198, at 553; Crawford, supra note 340, at 262 ("The Supreme Court should validate the use of the Tinker second prong analysis as an independent analytical tool to be used in student off-campus cyberspeech cases involving bullying and harassment."); Stacie A. Stewart, Comment, A Trade-Off That Becomes a Rip-Off: When Schools Can't Regulate Cyberbullying, 2013 BYU L. REV. 1645, 1660 (2013).

⁴⁰² Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 508 (1969).

⁴⁰³ Id.

the victim at school and impact the victim's educational rights. Thus, at the next opportunity, the Court should hold that, under Tinker's rights of others prong, a student who engages in speech that bullies or harasses another student in violation of state anti-bullying legislation and school policies has no First Amendment protection.⁴⁰⁴ Due to the impact on the victim within the school environment, school officials are authorized to impose discipline regardless of where such speech is created.

In this category of bullying or harassing speech, there is another issue that the Fifth Circuit's recent decision in Bell brings to the forefront—whether student off-campus speech that targets a school employee is entitled to First Amendment protection. In Bell, the Fifth Circuit determined that school officials could discipline a student whose off-campus speech threatened, harassed, or intimidated a teacher if the student intentionally directed the speech at the school community and school officials could reasonably forecast a substantial disruption.⁴⁰⁵ And yet the majority in Bell stated, albeit in dicta, that a student's off-campus speech that threatens, harasses, and intimidates a teacher arguably might always “portend[] a substantial disruption, making feasible a per se rule in that regard.”⁴⁰⁶ The majority in Bell thus suggested that off-campus student speech targeting a school official always is unprotected because the forecast of a substantial disruption is per se reasonable and thus assumed.

Thus, Bell reinvigorates a debate that had been prompted in part by the Third Circuit's decisions in Layshock and Snyder—two cases in which the students had created fake Internet profiles that ridiculed school administrators.⁴⁰⁷ In Snyder, six judges dissented from the ruling in favor of the ⁴⁰⁴ For a review of state anti-bullying laws, see Nisha Chandran, Crossing the Line: When Cyberbullying Prevention Operates as a Prior Restraint on Student Speech, 2016 U. ILL. J.L. TECH. & POL'Y 277, 282–83 (2016) (noting that, as of the time of publication, forty-nine states and the District of Columbia had enacted anti-bullying legislation). In 2015, Montana became the last state in the nation to enact anti-bullying legislation. See Lisa Baumann, Gov. Bullock Signs Montana Anti-bullying Bill into Law, GREAT FALLS TRIB. (Apr. 21, 2015), <http://www.greatfallstribune.com/story/news/local/2015/04/21/gov-bullock-signs-montana-anti-bullying-bill-law/26145567/> [<https://perma.cc/W8A7-72C5>]. An important issue, which is beyond the scope of this article, is how to define “bullying” or “harassment.” Some scholars assert that anti-bullying statutes contain vague language that unconstitutionally restricts students' First Amendment rights. See, e.g., John O. Hayward, Anti-cyberbullying Statutes: Threat to Student Free Speech, 59 CLEV. ST. L. REV. 85, 118 (2011).

⁴⁰⁵ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 396–400 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc).

⁴⁰⁶ Id. at 397.

⁴⁰⁷ See Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 205 (3d Cir. 2011) (en banc); J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915 (3d Cir. 2011).

student primarily on the ground that the decision left “schools defenseless to protect teachers and school officials”⁴⁰⁸ from malicious cyberattacks by students. Indeed, many scholars advocate that student off-campus speech that harasses a school employee should not be entitled to First Amendment protection.⁴⁰⁹ Still others argue that school authority should not be extended to off-campus electronic speech that targets school employees.⁴¹⁰ These scholars reason that, unlike students, the educational rights of school employees are not implicated by off-campus electronic speech that targets them.⁴¹¹ In addition, school employees should be “equipped emotionally and intellectually” to handle disrespectful or harassing speech published by a student.⁴¹² School employees also have the ability to impose discipline if such harassing speech is repeated at school. They have the ability to pursue civil remedies against students whose off-campus speech is defamatory or libelous.⁴¹³

While student-on-student bullying or harassment should not be protected speech for the reasons stated above, student off-campus speech that arguably bullies or harasses a school employee should not be subject to school discipline.⁴¹⁴

⁴⁰⁸ Snyder, 650 F.3d at 941.

⁴⁰⁹ McCarthy, Cyberbullying, supra note 401, at 823 (suggesting that all student electronic expression could be deemed to be in-school speech in order to allow discipline for speech “directed towards school personnel or classmates”); Smith-Butler, supra note 44, at 302 (“Speech described as bullying, harassing, libelous, or threatening, if it is directed at other students or school personnel, is not protected speech . . .”); Stewart, supra note 401, at 1658 (“The decisions in Layshock and J.S. are a rip-off to students and parents because the bullying of school staff affects the ability of a school to provide a quality education.”).

⁴¹⁰ Black, supra note 198, at 552–53 (disparagement of school personnel may have low disruptive impact); Christine M. Lorillard, When Children’s Rights “Collide”: Free Speech vs. The Right to Be Let Alone in the Context of Off-Campus “Cyberbullying”, 81 MISS. L.J. 189, 259 n.487 (2011) (distinguishing between student-on-student harassment and student-on-school employee harassment); Barry P. McDonald, Regulating Student Cyberspeech, 77 MO. L. REV. 727, 755 (2012).

⁴¹¹ Lorillard, supra note 410, at 259 n.287.

⁴¹² Id. (quoting Harper v. Poway Unified Sch. Dist., 445 F.3d 1166, 1183 (9th Cir. 2006)).

⁴¹³ Teachers can recover against students for libelous speech. See Aditi Mukherji, Teacher Gets $363K for Students’ Lies, Defamation, FINDLAW (Nov. 18, 2013), <http://blogs.findlaw.com/injured/2013/11/teacher-gets-363k-for-students-lies-defamation.html> [<https://perma.cc/4BL5-YUNE>].

⁴¹⁴ Analytically it is not clear that Tinker’s “rights of others” prong does apply to harassing or bullying speech that targets a school employee. The Court did refer to speech that either “inva[des],” or “collid[es] with,” the rights of others without saying specifically who the “others” might be. Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 513 (1969). However, in at least one portion of the opinion, the Court specifically referred only to the “rights of other students to be secure and to be let alone.” Id. at 508. Thus, it is not clear the rights of others prong as expressed in Tinker applies to school employees. See Philip T.K. Daniel, Bullying and Cyberbullying in Schools: An Analysis of Student Free Expression, Zero Tolerance Policies, and State Anti-harassment Legislation, 268 EDUC. L. REP. 619, 633 (2011).

Students have a First Amendment right to “express disrespect or disdain for their teachers,”⁴¹⁵ including expressing their views in vulgar terms if they wish.⁴¹⁶ Extending school authority to student off-campus speech that arguably bullies or harasses a school employee could impermissibly chill student speech. Students have the right to voice criticism of school policies, procedures, and personnel. There is a real danger that school officials might “engag[e] in illegitimate censorship of speech critical of their own actions rather than imposing discipline to protect legitimate institutional interests.”⁴¹⁷ School officials could overreach and violate a student’s constitutionally protected right to express complaints about a teacher’s competence, classroom demeanor, or other qualities simply to assuage a coworker’s hurt feelings.⁴¹⁸

The facts in Bell amply demonstrate this conundrum. If the arguably threatening lyrics of Bell’s song are not considered, the remainder of the song clearly ridiculed the coaches’ behavior (“drool running down your mouth”),⁴¹⁹ called them names (“pervert,” “crazy,” and “lame”),⁴²⁰ and denigrated a spouse’s appearance (“his wife ain’t got no ti[tt]ies”),⁴²¹ among other comments. Yet Bell also made a significant and substantive complaint that the coaches were sexually harassing female students (“looking down girls shirts,” “fucking with the students,” “rubbing on the black girls ears in the gym”).⁴²² Although the majority in Bell deemed these statements to be harassment and intimidation, one of the two coaches testified before the federal district court that he considered Bell’s speech to be “just a rap [song]” and that any issue about the song would “probably just die down” if he did not draw attention to it.⁴²³

⁴¹⁵ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 425 (5th Cir. 2015) (Dennis, J., dissenting).

⁴¹⁶ Klein v. Smith, 635 F. Supp. 1440, 1441–42 (D. Me. 1986) (holding that the school could not discipline a student for “giving the finger” to a teacher he encountered in a restaurant parking lot, stating: “The First Amendment protection of freedom of expression may not be made a casualty of the effort to force-feed good manners to the ruffians among us”).

⁴¹⁷ McDonald, supra note 410, at 728.

⁴¹⁸ There is also the additional question of how to define harassing or bullying speech in this context in such a way that students’ free speech rights are not chilled. Only a handful of state anti-bullying statutes apply to school personnel. Gold Waldman, supra note 345, at 635.

⁴¹⁹ Bell, 799 F.3d at 384.

⁴²⁰ Id.

⁴²¹ Id.

⁴²² Id.

⁴²³ Id. at 429 (Dennis, J., dissenting).

Was the song harassing and intimidating, as opposed to merely being disrespectful? Does the issue turn on whether the targeted school employee is upset? What about the fact that the student sought to publicize inappropriate conduct by a school employee? Given the possibility that students' constitutionally protected rights to question and criticize the conduct of school officials could be improperly curtailed, the Court should not endorse a per se rule that students may be disciplined for off-campus speech that harasses or bullies a school employee based solely on content of the speech.⁴²⁴

Declining to extend authority over student off-campus speech that harasses or bullies a school employee does not leave school administrators without recourse. If the off-campus speech enters the school environment in such a way that a student either engages in lewd or indecent speech or causes a substantial disruption, then school officials have clear authority to impose discipline.⁴²⁵ Indeed, school officials overwhelmingly prevail in cases that challenge the authority to discipline students for vulgar or disrespectful on-campus speech directed toward school employees.⁴²⁶ That disciplinary authority would extend to any student who, although not the original author of the speech, repeats the contents of the off-campus speech because the second student has engaged in speech within the school environment.

In addition, any direct electronic communications between a student and a school employee should be deemed to be "in-school" speech. As Judge Smith correctly noted in his concurring opinion in Snyder, a different analysis should apply where a student "sen[ds] a disruptive email to school faculty from his home computer."⁴²⁷ Students increasingly communicate electronically with school employees as part of their coursework. Those direct student-to-school communications are not out-of-⁴²⁴ Extending authority to allow discipline for off-campus electronic speech that harasses or denigrates a teacher could encourage schools to engage in electronic surveillance of students' electronic communications. See, e.g., Emily F. Suski, Beyond the Schoolhouse Gates: The Unprecedented Expansion of School Surveillance Authority Under Cyberbullying Laws, 65 CASE WESTERN RES. L. REV. 63 (2014).

⁴²⁵ Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 685 (1986); Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 513 (1969). Student on-campus speech that upsets a "civil and respectful atmosphere toward teachers" constitutes a substantial disruption. Requa v. Kent Sch. Dist. No. 415, 492 F. Supp. 2d 1272, 1280 (W.D. Wash. 2007).

⁴²⁶ Gold Waldman, supra note 345, at 617 (noting that students generally lose cases in which they challenged disciplinary action taken with respect to hostile or disrespectful speech directed to school employees).

⁴²⁷ J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915, 940 (3d Cir. 2011).

school communications simply because the student is not physically in school. Rather, the student is acting “qua student”⁴²⁸ and any speech in that context would be subject to discipline under the Supreme Court’s existing precedents.⁴²⁹ Specifically, electronic communications between a student and a school employee is speech that, per Morse, is uttered in a “school-sanctioned and school-supervised” setting.⁴³⁰ If the speech is lewd, indecent, or offensive, it is subject to discipline under Fraser.⁴³¹ If it creates a substantial disruption—e.g., the student’s speech is communicated to the entire class via email and causes a distraction—then it is subject to discipline under Tinker.⁴³²

Finally, school officials and the targeted employee have other tools at their disposal. Although the school may not be able to discipline the student purely on the basis of off-campus speech, school officials who become aware of such speech can inform the student that his or her speech has been seen by school officials and that the student will be subject to discipline if the speech impacts the school environment.⁴³³ School officials also can bring the student’s speech to the attention of the student’s parents. Finally, if the particular school employee finds the speech to be libelous or defamatory, the employee could avail himself or herself of civil remedies.⁴³⁴

⁴²⁸ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 389 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc).

⁴²⁹ Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 396 (2007).

⁴³⁰ Id.; see Susan S. Bendlin, Far from the Classroom, the Cafeteria, and the Playing Field: Why Should the School’s Disciplinary Arm Reach Speech Made in a Student’s Bedroom, 48 WILLAMETTE L. REV. 195, 241 (2011) (“The Supreme Court has already made it clear in Morse that when the activity was school-approved, attended by students, and supervised by school administrators and teacher, a student’s speech could be regulated there even though he was literally standing off campus and not inside the schoolhouse gate.”).

⁴³¹ Bethel Sch. Dist. No. 403 v. Fraser, 478 U.S. 675, 685–86 (1986).

⁴³² Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 513 (1969).

⁴³³ See Ari Ezra Waldman, Hostile Educational Environments, 71 MD. L. REV. 705, 727 (2012). Indeed, school officials would have the opportunity to teach an important lesson about our democracy. See Mary Sue Backus, OMG! Missing the Teachable Moment and Undermining the Future of the First Amendment—TISNF!, 60 CASE WESTERN RES. L. REV. 153, 200 (2009).

⁴³⁴ See Alexander G. Tuneski, Online, Not Grounds: Protecting Student Internet Speech, 89 VA. L. REV. 139, 142 (2003) (mentioning potential civil remedies); Backus, supra note 433, at 187–88 (noting that a school employee successfully sued a student and his parents for injuries resulting from the student’s off-campus expression). School boards would not incur any liability in an action filed by an employee who was the target of a student’s off-campus speech if the Court were clear that such off-campus speech is protected under the First Amendment. Gold Waldman, supra note 345, at 634.

C. Tinker's Substantial Disruption Standard Should Apply to a Student's Off-Campus Speech Only When an Actual Disruption Has Occurred

To date, with the exception of the Ninth Circuit's decision in Wynar, all of the circuit courts that have imposed discipline for students' off-campus electronic speech have imposed a threshold test that must be satisfied before analyzing the speech under Tinker. In the Second, Fourth, and Eighth Circuits, the threshold inquiry is a "reasonable foreseeability" test.⁴³⁵ The Fifth Circuit's recent decision in Bell set forth an "intentional[] direct[ion]" threshold test that is similar to the one proposed by Judge Smith in his concurring opinion in Snyder.⁴³⁶ For the following reasons, none of these threshold tests should be adopted by the Court.

Some scholars have expressed approval of the Second Circuit's "reasonable foreseeability" test as appropriately balancing the First Amendment rights of students and the authority of school officials to maintain a proper school environment.⁴³⁷ These scholars believe that a "two-tiered"⁴³⁸ inquiry under which school officials must first determine the reasonable foreseeability that a student's speech would reach school is a "more conservative approach"⁴³⁹ that provides greater protection to students' First Amendment rights, essentially because there is a threshold inquiry before Tinker's substantial disruption standard is applied.⁴⁴⁰

However, Judge Smith noted in Snyder that such a standard easily can be "stretched too far"⁴⁴¹ and thus "risk[s] ensnaring any off-campus expression that happened to discuss school-related matters."⁴⁴² Most forms of digital speech, ⁴³⁵ Although the Kowalski decision has been interpreted by some as creating a "nexus" test, the Fourth Circuit did not state that it was adopting a "nexus" test, nor did it outline the elements or factors that comprise such a test. See supra Section II.C.

⁴³⁶ J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915, 940 (3d Cir. 2011).

⁴³⁷ Black, supra note 198, at 551–52 (citing Paul Easton, Splitting the Difference: Layshock and J.S. Chart a Different Path on Student Speech Rights, 53 B.C. L. REV. E-SUPP. 17 (2012)).

⁴³⁸ Black, supra note 198, at 551.

⁴³⁹ Id.

⁴⁴⁰ Wynar v. Douglas Cty. Sch. Dist., 728 F.3d 1062, 1068 (9th Cir. 2013).

⁴⁴¹ Snyder, 650 F.3d at 940.

⁴⁴² Id.; see also Clay Calvert, Punishing Public School Students for Bashing Principals, Teachers & Classmates in Cyberspace, 7 FIRST AMEND. L. REV. 210, 251 (2009) ("[A]n approach like that adopted by the Second Circuit that relies solely on whether it is reasonably foreseeable that the question in question will come to the attention of school authorities gives schools sweeping off-campus jurisdictional power.").

whether a public posting on the Internet⁴⁴³ or a private text message sent to just one other person, can be preserved and later shown to others. Thus, it is hard to conceptualize a form of digital expression that could not be brought to the attention of school officials. Indeed, it is surely true that the students in Layshock and Snyder did not foresee that the disparaging MySpace profiles they created would come to the attention of their school principals. If just one student shares what was intended to be a private communication, school officials will become aware of the off-campus speech.⁴⁴⁴ Indeed, many forms of electronic speech can proliferate far beyond the initial transmission by the author through, for example, someone's "friends" on Facebook or Instagram or the ability to "like" a particular post.⁴⁴⁵ Because almost all electronic speech could be deemed as "reasonably foreseeable" to come to the attention of school officials, the reasonable foreseeability standard seems to provide very little protection to students.⁴⁴⁶

In addition, the type of student off-campus electronic speech that most likely would come to the attention of school authorities would be speech relating to school events or individuals. By providing such a low threshold for the imposition of school discipline, the reasonable foreseeability test unduly constricts students' ability to engage in free speech about an important and predominant aspect of their lives: school.⁴⁴⁷ Students would have very limited First Amendment rights if, in speaking about school matters while not at school, they must restrict the audience to such an extent that it would be unreasonable for their speech to come to the attention of school authorities.

The intentional direction language used by the Fifth Circuit in Bell might, at first glance, appear to set a higher threshold because it would require that the student had ⁴⁴³ A Facebook post, for example.

⁴⁴⁴ Snyder, 650 F.3d at 921 (A student who was in the principal's office due to an "unrelated incident" told the principal about the parody profile.).

⁴⁴⁵ See Web Applications: How to Hide My Likes from My Friends on Facebook?, STACKEXCHANGE, <http://webapps.stackexchange.com/questions/24391/how-to-hide-my-likes-from-my-friends-on-facebook> [<https://perma.cc/B4HU-5G3L>].

⁴⁴⁶ See Bendlin, supra note 430, at 221–22 ("[U]nder the foreseeability test . . . it is hard to know in advance how or when an Internet message might be printed out or brought on to the campus (in some form) by someone other than the student-speaker. The problem with vague standards is that neither school officials nor students know exactly what the rules are." (footnote omitted)).

⁴⁴⁷ Emily Gold Waldman, Regulating Student Speech: Suppression Versus Punishment, 85 IND. L.J. 1113, 1128 (2010) ("The Second Circuit's broad construction of the 'reasonable foreseeability' test thus suggests that schools may possess jurisdiction over virtually all student Internet speech that relates to school issues and tries to galvanize student action.").

directed speech into the school environment.⁴⁴⁸ However, it suffers from essentially the same defects as the reasonable foreseeability test. Again, the threshold for imposition of authority is quite low if a student's intentional direction is determined by the extent to which the student spoke on a matter of interest to the school community and intended that other students would consider the speech.⁴⁴⁹ As with the reasonable foreseeability test, it seems that students would essentially have no protection if they sought to speak about a matter in any way related to school and if they wanted their speech to reach others.⁴⁵⁰ In addition, the intentional direction test has the added difficulty of asking school officials to determine the subjective intent of a student before imposing discipline.⁴⁵¹

The better rule is to not have any threshold tests. With the exception of speech constituting threats of violence or student-on-student bullying, as discussed above,⁴⁵² school officials should be given the authority to impose discipline only when the student's purely off-campus speech actually causes a substantial disruption at school. In other words, student speech, no matter where it is created, that causes an actual substantial disruption within the school environment should be subject to discipline.⁴⁵³ If a student's speech actually disrupts the school environment, the student should not be shielded from discipline by the excuse that the speech was created off campus. Given the prevalence of electronic communications and easy access to such communications even in the school environment, the off-campus electronic nature of the communications should not be relevant to the inquiry. The issue should be solely whether the student's speech caused a substantial disruption in the school environment. Thus, Tinker should apply even without the necessity of some threshold test.

⁴⁴⁸ See, e.g., David A. Polsinelli, Comment, Untangling the Web: A More Guided Approach to Student Speech on the Internet, 54 S. TEX. L. REV. 779, 807–08 (2013); Lindsay J. Gower, Blue Mountain School District v. J.S. ex rel. Snyder: Will the Supreme Court Provide Clarification for Public School Officials Regarding Off-Campus Internet Speech?, 64 ALA. L. REV. 709, 730 (2013) (arguing in favor of a “purposeful direction” standard as superior to a foreseeability test).

⁴⁴⁹ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 386, 394 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc) (finding that Bell intentionally directed his rap song at the school community, presumably because of his apparent admissions that he wanted to bring awareness to the coaches' conduct and he knew students would listen to the song).

⁴⁵⁰ Id. at 418 (Dennis, J., dissenting) (deeming the majority's intentional direction inquiry to be incurably ambiguous).

⁴⁵¹ Benjamin L. Ellison, More Connection, Less Protection? Off-Campus Speech with On-Campus Impact, 85 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 809, 836 (2010) (“Subjective intent can be difficult to determine.”).

⁴⁵² See supra Sections III.A, III.B.

⁴⁵³ Bendlin, supra note 430, at 222.

There is an important limitation to the application of Tinker, namely that school officials ought not be allowed to discipline a student for purely off-campus electronic speech based on a reasonable forecast of a substantial disruption. As discussed in more detail below,⁴⁵⁴ because of the potential to chill students' ability to engage in free speech when not at school, school officials' authority to impose discipline for purely off-campus speech should extend only to student speech that caused an actual disruption at school, not just a reasonable forecast about future potential disruptions. The off-campus nature of the speech, coupled with the prognosticating of school officials about future events, has constitutional implications—primarily that school officials would impermissibly chill student speech by overemphasizing the potential for a future disruption.

However, expressly applying Tinker to student off-campus electronic speech is not the end of the inquiry. If the Court applied Tinker to student off-campus speech, then the Court would need to define the word “substantial.” In that regard, it is relevant that, even with evidence in Tinker that a mathematics class had been “practically ‘wrecked’ chiefly by disputes,”⁴⁵⁵ the Court found no substantial disruption.⁴⁵⁶ A substantial disruption should be something much more than “general ‘rumblings’”⁴⁵⁷ among students, “minor inconveniences” to school personnel, or limited distractions from classwork.⁴⁵⁸ Rather, a substantial disruption would require, as noted in Bell, “boisterous conduct, interruption of classes, or [a] lack of order, discipline and decorum at the school.”⁴⁵⁹

In addition to defining when a disruption is substantial, the Court also would have to address the issue of causation. In ⁴⁵⁴ See infra Section III.D.

⁴⁵⁵ Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 517 (1969) (Black, J., dissenting).

⁴⁵⁶ Id. at 508 (majority opinion) (“There is no indication that the work of the schools or any class was disrupted. Outside the classrooms, a few students made hostile remarks to the children wearing armbands, but there were no threats or acts of violence on school premises.”).

⁴⁵⁷ J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 650 F.3d 915, 922 (3d Cir. 2011).

⁴⁵⁸ J.S. ex rel. Snyder v. Blue Mountain Sch. Dist., 593 F.3d 286, 299 (3d Cir. 2010).

⁴⁵⁹ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 774 F.3d 280, 296 (5th Cir. 2015). School officials sometimes are wildly off-base in their own judgment that a substantial disruption has occurred at school. See, e.g., T.V. ex rel. B.V. v. Smith-Green Cmty. Sch. Corp., 807 F. Supp. 2d 767, 784 (N.D. Ind. 2011) (The court ruled that a school district had violated the First Amendment rights of two high school students who posted provocative photos of themselves over the summer vacation, finding that “two complaints from parents and some petty sniping among a group of 15 and 16 year olds. . . can’t be what the Supreme Court had in mind when it enunciated the ‘substantial disruption’ standard in Tinker.”).

his concurring opinion in Snyder, Judge Smith indirectly raised this issue by describing a scenario in which a student, outside of school hours, posted a blog supporting gay marriage, to which other students had a negative reaction.⁴⁶⁰ He hypothesized that classmates who opposed gay marriage might, in reacting to the speech, “cause[] a substantial disruption at school.”⁴⁶¹ Judge Smith determined that, if Tinker were to apply to off-campus electronic speech, the student who posted the blog entry could be subject to discipline.⁴⁶²

In Judge Smith’s hypothetical, the student who posts the blog should not be subject to discipline simply because there is a lack of causation. Except in very limited circumstances,⁴⁶³ speech that provokes a reaction in others who might show their disagreement by causing a disruption does not make the speaker responsible for the audience’s actions. In the hypothetical posed by Judge Smith, the student in favor of gay marriage would not have caused a disruption. Rather, the students who would have voiced their opposition at school would be the cause of any substantial disruption.⁴⁶⁴

Such a rule might be difficult to follow sometimes. Students might engage in off-campus speech, such as racist comments, that could provoke strong reactions.⁴⁶⁵ However, in our democracy, even speech that many citizens would find “shabby, offensive, or even ugly” is entitled to First Amendment protection.⁴⁶⁶ One of the burdens that we citizens face as a “trade-off” for our own free speech rights is to recognize the constitutional rights of other citizens to voice opinions that we might abhor. When faced with such speech, students could learn a valuable civics lesson about the fundamental values of our democracy and the ways in which others have responded to ⁴⁶⁰ Snyder, 650 F.3d at 939.

⁴⁶¹ Id.

⁴⁶² Id.

⁴⁶³ While the Supreme Court in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 572–74 (1942) established that “fighting words” are not protected under the First Amendment because of their effect on listeners, the Court’s recent decision in Snyder greatly limits the applicability of that doctrine. Snyder v. Phelps, 562 U.S. 443, 459–61 (2011).

⁴⁶⁴ Imposing discipline upon a student who expresses a particular view outside of school based on the reactions of other students to the speech would constitute an unconstitutional application of the “heckler’s veto.” See Daniel Ortner, The Terrorist’s Veto: Why the First Amendment Must Protect Provocative Portrayals of the Prophet Muhammad, 12 NW. J.L. & SOC. POL’Y 1, 27 (2016).

⁴⁶⁵ S.J.W. ex rel. Wilson v. Lee’s Summit Sch. Dist., 696 F.3d 771, 773 (8th Cir. 2012).

⁴⁶⁶ Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 426 (5th Cir. 2015) (Dennis, J., dissenting) (quoting United States v. Playboy Entm’t Grp., 529 U.S. 803, 826 (2000)).

hateful or disturbing language or conduct.⁴⁶⁷ Such a result would be a valuable addition to our students' education.

D. As to a Forecast of a Substantial Disruption, School Officials Should Not Be Able to Discipline Students for Their Off-Campus Speech

Finally, the Court also should determine that, as to off-campus speech, school officials may not impose discipline based on nothing more than a reasonable forecast of a future substantial disruption.⁴⁶⁸ Again, this rule would be applicable only if the Court also determined that student off-campus electronic speech is not protected when (a) the speech is a credible threat of violence against any member of the school community⁴⁶⁹ or (b) it bullies or harasses another student.⁴⁷⁰ With those two rules in place, student off-campus speech generally should not be subject to discipline based on a potential future disruption.⁴⁷¹

School authority over off-campus speech should be limited to discipline for actual, not forecasted disruptions, because of the risk that school officials will overzealously predict disruptions. In his dissent in Bell, Judge Dennis aptly described the difficulty of forecasting future disruptions, stating:

If this standard were applied off campus, how can a student or a student's parents know with any degree of certainty when off-campus online speech can be "forecasted" to cause a "substantial disruption"? Although Tinker is not a completely toothless standard, . . . its framework inherently requires guesswork about how a third-party school official will prophesize over the effect of speech.⁴⁷²

Judge Dennis is right. Students' constitutional right to speak freely when they are not at school should not be subject to second-guessing by a school official about the potential future impact on the school environment. Rather, other than ⁴⁶⁷ Backus, supra note 433, at 200.

⁴⁶⁸ Tinker v. Des Moines Indep. Cmty. Sch. Dist., 393 U.S. 503, 514 (1969) (Stewart, J., concurring).

⁴⁶⁹ See supra Section III.A.

⁴⁷⁰ See supra Section III.B.

⁴⁷¹ Denying school officials the authority to discipline students for off-campus electronic speech on the basis of a potential future disruption is not the same constitutional analysis as allowing school officials the authority to prohibit students from wearing clothing that displays or represents a point of view (e.g., the Confederate flag) in order to avoid future disruptions. See Dariano v. Morgan Hill Unified Sch. Dist., 767 F.3d 764 (9th Cir. 2014) (determining that school officials could prohibit students from wearing clothing bearing the symbol of the American flag on Cinco de Mayo).

⁴⁷² Bell v. Itawamba Cty. Sch. Bd., 799 F.3d 379, 386, 418–19 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc) (quoting A.M. ex rel. McAllum v. Cash, 585 F.3d 214, 221 (5th Cir. 2009)).

violent or student-on-student bullying speech, school officials simply should not be able to impose discipline for off-campus speech without concrete evidence that the speech actually impacted the school environment. Constitutional rights should not depend on the extent to which a particular school official undertakes a crystal ball inquiry about the potential future effect of a student's off-campus speech.⁴⁷³ Indeed, the vagueness of the standard would allow school officials to conjure up reasons why student off-campus speech that they find distasteful, perhaps because they do not like the language⁴⁷⁴ or images used,⁴⁷⁵ could cause some future disruption at school.

CONCLUSION

Both the lower federal courts and school officials need Supreme Court guidance on all of the important First Amendment considerations that are implicated by students' off-campus electronic speech. By denying certiorari in Bell, the Court missed an outstanding opportunity to provide that necessary guidance.

Given the facts in Bell, the Court could have provided guidance regarding speech that threatens violence in the school setting or harasses or bullies other students. If the Court indeed addresses the issue in the near future, the Court should provide clear guidance with regard to student electronic speech that contains credible threats of violence or constitutes student-on-student bullying. These particular forms of speech present special dangers in the school environment that require particular vigilance and swift action on the part of school officials.⁴⁷⁶

The Court also could have clarified important aspects of Tinker's substantial disruption standard, beginning with an affirmation that Tinker's principles apply as equally well in the digital age as they did when first articulated in 1969. When given the opportunity, the Court should find that Tinker's ⁴⁷³ For a review of cases that address the reasonableness of a forecast of future substantial disruption caused by students' off-campus electronic speech, see Samantha M. Levin, School Districts as Weathermen: The School's Ability to Reasonably Forecast Substantial Disruption to the School Environment from Students' Online Speech, 38 FORDHAM URB. L.J. 859, 870–889 (2011).

⁴⁷⁴ See Bell, 799 F.3d at 429 (Dennis, J., dissenting) (noting that, in the preliminary injunction hearing, the school board's lawyer characterized Bell's rap song as "filthy").

⁴⁷⁵ T.V. ex rel. B.V. v. Smith-Green Cmty. Sch. Corp., 807 F. Supp. 2d 767, 784 (N.D. Ind. 2011) (school district could not reasonably foresee a future disruption arising from sexually suggestive photos that had been posted by two high school students over summer vacation).

⁴⁷⁶ Morse v. Frederick, 551 U.S. 393, 424 (2007).

substantial disruption standard applies to student off-campus speech so long as the speech creates an actual disruption at school. However, the Court should also recognize the potential for improper overreach by school officials with regard to students' off-campus electronic speech and thus limit officials' authority to speech that causes an actual disruption at school. In other words, school officials should not be permitted to impose discipline based on their opinion that, having read a student's electronic speech, some future disruption might occur at school.

While the decision not to grant certiorari in Bell represents a missed opportunity to clarify students' First Amendment rights in the digital age, the lower federal courts and school officials alike can hope that, in the near future, the Court will provide the needed guidance.